Mr. TAWNEY. I understand that it may be usual in concurrent resolutions which originate at the other end of the Capitol, but it is not the rule as to distribution which the House has heretofore followed; and if it were there is a very good reason why that rule should now be changed, because the House to-day consists of 386 Members, whereas heretofore it consisted of 356. I move, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that the resolution be so amended as to provide 3,000 copies for the use of the Senate and 12,000 for the use of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 7 strike out the word "five" and insert in lieu thereof the word "three."

Also, in line 8, strike out the word "ten" and insert in lieu thereof the word "twelve."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The question was taken; and the resolution was agreed to.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER-GENERAL OF IMMIGRATION.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the Senate concurrent resolution which I will send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed in paper covers, at the Government Printing Office, 5,500 additional copies of the annual report of the Commissioner-General of Immigration for the year ended June 30, 1903, with illustrations, of which 1,000 shall be for the use of the Senate and 2,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and the remaining 2,500 copies shall be delivered to the Bureau of Immigration for distribution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution which has just been reported?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS, a motion to reconsider the several votes by which the several resolutions were passed was laid on the table.

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the urgent deficiency bill. Before we go into committee I desire, if possible, that we may agree upon a limit for general debate. I ask the attention of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON].

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I should like to know whether points of order have been reserved on this bill.

Mr. HEMENWAY. There have been.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I suggest we should like about two hours on our side.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Well, I ask unanimous consent that there be five hours of discussion on the bill in the Committee of the Whole, two hours and a half on a side, the time of the majority side to be controlled by myself and on the minority side by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] asks unanimous consent that general debate in Committee of the Whole on this bill be limited to five hours, one-half of that time to be controlled by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON]. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. HEMENWAY, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. TAWNEY in the chair) and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10954) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and for prior years and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] is recognized.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, before referring to the provisions of the bill which I bring before the House, I want to call attention to the condition of the Treasury of the United States. It is well in the affairs of Government as well as private affairs to take occasionally an account of stock and see "where we are at."

In view of different statements made by Members of this Congress in which legislation is suggested upon the ground that we have a large surplus in the Treasury, I think it my duty to call the attention of the House and of the country to a real problem that we are called upon to solve. It is this: How can we reduce the estimated expenses of the Government for the ensuing fiscal year $42,000,000?

The total estimates submitted at the beginning of this session for ordinary expenses, exclusive of $56,500,000 required to meet the sinking fund, amount to $727,474,206.79.

In addition, more than ten millions in the nature of supplemental estimates have come to the Committee on Appropriations by reference of the House. Those that have gone to other committees and still more that will follow that will come to Congress before the session closes will surely increase that sum at least $15,000,000. The arbitrary cut made in the Engineer's estimates for contract work on rivers and harbors, which will probably not be sustained if the contract obligations are met, amounts to $4,843,716. Adding these sums to the original estimates makes a grand total of $747,317,922.79.

The total revenues are estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury for the fiscal year beginning July 1 next at $704,472,060.72. Estimates in excess of the probable total revenues, $42,845,862.07.

The problem is all the more serious when we realize that at the last session Congress appropriated, exclusive of deficiencies, within less than $10,000,000 all that was submitted in the estimates, and that at the first session of the last Congress—the session corresponding to the present session of this Congress—the appropriations, exclusive of deficiencies and the large sum of $50,130,000 for the isthmian canal, approached the sum of the estimates within a little less than $24,000,000.

Nor is there any comfort afforded in the fact that the total estimates, excluding the sinking fund, submitted last Congress were at the first session thereof $19,672,311.53 less than the estimated revenues, and at the last session $44,310,887.70 less than the estimated revenues.

It only argues that we now have no latitude to appropriate beyond the lines laid down in the regular estimates, and that those lines must of necessity be materially contracted. Three of the great annual supply bills for the Government—the pension, legislative, executive, and judicial, and the army—have passed the House. They carry in the aggregate $242,006,123.35, nearly one-third of the whole annual estimates, as presented to us by the Executive. Yet they show a reduction in the sum total of only $4,116,623.26 under those estimates. If the ratio of reduction is not materially increased when we come to consider the remaining bills, the expenses for the next fiscal year, as we shall authorize them, can only be met by heavy inroads on the surplus in the Treasury.

The present net cash balance in the Treasury amounts to $224,000,000. This sum is likely to be materially diminished in the near future (1) by payment on account of the isthmian canal, $50,000,000; (2) by requisition on account of unexpended balances of appropriations, which are: For increase of the Navy, $27,000,000; for rivers and harbors, $37,000,000; for public buildings, $17,000,000; total, $131,000,000.

Thus, if all outstanding obligations fixed by appropriations already made were liquidated the net cash in the Treasury would be reduced to the dangerously low-water mark of $93,000,000, a sum less than it has reached at any period since the era of depression that antedated the beginning of Mr. McKinley's first Administration.

There yet remains to be appropriated to meet contract obligations authorized chiefly by the last Congress on account of public works, as follows:

For increase of the Navy	$82,718,659.00
For rivers and harbors	36,628,964.89
For public buildings	17,161,609.34
Total	136,509,233.23

The estimates of appropriations required to be made at this session on account of the foregoing are:

For increase of the Navy	$38,226,800.00
For rivers and harbors (engineers' estimates)	13,540,753.00

There should be no legislation passed reducing revenues, and this Congress must exercise economy, not refusing any necessary item, to meet the growing expenses of this great country, but to strike from the estimates and from the appropriation bills reported to this House every superfluous item. We must keep within the revenues.

Now, gentlemen, I desire to call attention to the bill that has been presented to the House. It is something more than an urgent deficiency bill; we have made it general in its character, in that it provides for all ascertained obligations of the Government for the current and prior fiscal years. For instance, judgments of the Court of Claims, judgments of the courts generally, and accounts that are audited and ascertained by the different departments of the Government. All have been taken care of on this bill.

We are urging certain legislation upon the bill. It is, of course, subject to a point of order, and can only go through by the unanimous consent of the House.

The first item is legislation authorizing the Government board of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition to rent certain buildings in the city of Washington. It seems to be necessary in getting together the different Government exhibits that they should have certain rooms in the city of Washington. The general statute prohibits the renting of any buildings in the District of Columbia without express authority of law. So we put that item on the bill authorizing these buildings to be rented.

We next propose the following:

The President is hereby authorized to establish convenient districts for the collection of revenue from customs, and for that purpose may subdivide any State or Territory within or appurtenant to the United States, or may unite two or more States or Territories within or appurtenant to the United States, or any part or parts thereof, into one district, and may from time to time alter said districts: Provided, That there shall be no more than 123 collection districts.

We have to-day in the United States about 165 collection districts. Many of these districts are maintained at great loss to the Government. I will put in the RECORD a statement taken from page 25 of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, which shows these districts that are maintained at a loss to the Government. For instance, at Elizabeth City, N. C., we have a port, the receipts of which last year were $87. It cost the Government $1,770 to maintain that district. We have at Brownsville, Tex., a district, where the receipts last year were $4,700 in round figures, and it cost the Government $31,000 to maintain the district. We have at Galena, Ill., a district, where there was collected 70 cents last year——

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I will directly. It cost the Government $378 to maintain that district; and so all along the line, in the last year, and from year to year, are given the amount collected and the amount it cost to maintain the port. Now I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. What do you propose to do with reference to these offices?

Mr. HEMENWAY. What do we propose to do in the matter?

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Have you any suggestion in your bill?

Mr. HEMENWAY. We propose here by the bill to legislate substantially in the same manner as was done in regard to the internal-revenue collection districts in 1877. Years ago the same condition existed in the Internal-Revenue Service. They had numerous unnecessary collection districts all over the country, and provision was placed upon an appropriation bill authorizing the President of the United States to combine the districts and limit the number they should have in the United States. Under that legislation the districts were combined and many were discontinued.

The service is reputed to be to-day the best administered and least expensive branch of the public service. The internal revenue is collected, collected promptly, collected easily, at a very light expense, and there is no reason why the customs should not be collected in the same way. The Secretary of the Treasury, quoting again from his report, pages 109 and 110 to 113, gives tables showing that $230,740,925 of internal revenue was collected during the last fiscal year with 1,314 employees, at a total cost of only $4,771,188.50, or a little over 2 per cent on the dollar. During the same period there was collected in revenue from customs $287,784,499; the service cost $8,464,558.14, or more than 3 per cent on the dollar, and employed 6,358 persons.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Would you still have your officer at each one of these small ports?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Where it was necessary there would simply be an officer there in charge, as you have now. You have your stamp agencies——

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Your deputies.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Your deputies. For instance, in the State of Indiana there used to be quite a number of districts—I think five or six—for the collection of internal revenue, and in each district was a separate organization employing many persons. That has all been done away with. We have now two districts, and at each important point of the State——

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Your proposition would not then close these ports; or would your proposition close these ports?

Mr. HEMENWAY. It would not close a single port of the United States that is necessary. The effect would be in such places we would not have a high-salaried Presidential officer and a great army of clerks; they would have simply a deputy, with a sufficient force to transact the public business.

Mr. MADDOX. And it would consolidate some of them?

Mr. HEMENWAY. And it would consolidate some of them. As I have stated, this item is subject to a point of order, but I do not believe that Members of this House will make a point of order against an item that will result in such a great reform.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This provision contemplates a very great change for these offices, does it not?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Oh, certainly it contemplates a great change in the offices.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Probably the most comprehensive legislation on this subject that would be enacted in years?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I did not understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is the most comprehensive legislation on this matter that has been enacted or will be enacted in some years.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Well, as I understand it, there has been no legislation upon the question since 1872, except to add to the number of collection districts. I want to say to the gentleman that it is almost impossible to agree upon legislation upon this matter. When you try to get a bill that will specify points all over the United States it is a very difficult thing to agree upon it. Members of the House looking after their particular districts or their particular territory insist that that port should be here or there, so that it is much better to leave the whole matter, as was done in the case of the collection of internal revenue, to the officer in charge to simply put the port where it is absolutely necessary. We have had experience along this line in the collection of internal revenue and it has worked well. It was started just as this has started, the item being in almost the exact language.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Has there been any effort made to agree upon such a bill as the gentleman refers to?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Oh, I can not say as to that. I judge there has been, as this evil has existed for many years, and it is reasonable to believe that efforts have been made to agree upon a bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I want to ask the gentleman if he believes that legislation of such important character should be ingrafted upon an appropriation bill?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I do in this instance, because there is no better place to put it, and we have had, as I say, an example in the result of the legislation placed upon an appropriation bill in regard to the collection of internal revenue. We have so thoroughly demonstrated in that department that it can be done that there is no danger in following the same legislation in regard to the collection of customs. Nearly all remedial legislation of this character has had its origin and abiding place on appropriation bills, a recent notable instance being the abolition of the fee system for United States attorneys and marshals, that was accomplished on an appropriation bill and has resulted in the saving of many millions of dollars to the country.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman will permit me, this bill was reported to the House last Saturday?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. FITZGERALD. A copy of the bill or of the report was unavailable until yesterday to the Members, and now the gentleman urges Members of this House to favor this provision of the bill and reads from a report to which no attention is called in the report from his committee, and it seems to me that it is unfair to the Members of this House to ask them to pass upon such important legislation in this way.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I read from the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, which was sent to the different Members of Congress, and they have certainly had it in their possession for the last month, I should say, or six weeks.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not at all; about two weeks.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from New Jersey?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I do for a question.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. In your judgment, will this change in any way affect the commercial interests of our country to their detriment?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Not in the least. At every point where it is necessary to have a port I have no doubt there will be one, in charge of a deputy or in charge of a collector; but it will result in this, that a great many ports which are unnecessary, as it can be shown by this report, will be abolished and less important ones will be consolidated. Why should a collection port exist that turns in only $5.19?

Mr. BARTLETT. How much does it cost to collect that?

Mr. HEMENWAY. In one instance, $236. In many instances it is a great deal higher than that. There is one point where it costs, if you take the report, $136 to collect $1, and there is another place where it costs $540 to collect $1.

Here is another place where it costs $540 to collect a dollar; another where it costs $258 to collect a dollar.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. There are no great comprehensive changes connected with this legislation, but it is of great importance in the line of economy?

Mr. HEMENWAY. That is all.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Maine?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I will.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. How much will it reduce expenses to make these changes? Has the gentleman made any estimate of that?

Mr. HEMENWAY. The estimate is about $100,000 a year, and they think they can save more than that.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Has the gentleman any detailed statement showing where it will come in?

Mr. HEMENWAY. The detailed statement contains the number of unnecessary ports to be dispensed with. We have a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, which I will put into the RECORD, and which goes into it in detail.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Is there any place where there is a collectorship to-day that it would not be necessary to have a deputy collector in case you abolish the collectorship?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Yes.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Where?

Mr. HEMENWAY. If the gentleman wants me to go into detail, I can only give him my opinion, and it might not be of any value. I refer him to the list printed on page 25 of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the gentleman can figure out the places where the ports ought to be discontinued.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. If you discontinue a collectorship and it is necessary to appoint a deputy under the civil service, will it not in many instances entail a larger expense rather than a smaller expense?

Mr. HEMENWAY. No; there is not a single instance where it would entail a larger expense, but in every instance the expense will be reduced.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. My own impression is that there are places where it would cost more.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I do not think there is a place in the United States where it could possibly cost more.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Is it always a fair method in determining the necessity of a collectorship to take the amount of revenue collected as compared with the cost of collection?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Not always. At certain great ports of the United States where inspectors are necessary the amount collected does not always determine the importance of the port, but at interior ports it always determines the importance of the port.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. I have the honor to represent several hundred miles of coast and interior line, and there are three or four collectorships along that line. I do not know but one—that is Machias—where it costs more than the receipts. I think none of the others cost more than their receipts. One of them, Bangor, is the largest collector of revenue in the State. Now, along that line it is necessary, for the prevention of smuggling, as there are several railroads that cross the line, to have deputy collectors and inspectors, whether you have a collectorship or not.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Let me say to the gentleman that there are seven ports in Maine where the revenue collected amounts to less than the expenditures.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. I would like to ask the gentleman if Machias is one of them?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Belfast is the first one in the list.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. That is not in my district.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The gentleman can get the list from page 25 of the Secretary's report.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. I want to say to the gentleman that I do not want to vote for any such radical change in existing law without I carefully look into it.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The gentleman will have ample time to do that.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana a question.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Very well.

Mr. MADDOX. Isn't it true that these subports that the gentleman is talking about have added largely to the expense of collection of the revenue of the country? Does not the Assistant Secretary say himself that these expensive ports from which we receive no revenue have created these deficiencies that the gentleman is asking for in this bill? His testimony seems to be pretty full in this report, which it seems the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has not discovered.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from Georgia misunderstood what I said. The statement of the Assistant Secretary is in the report, but the list of places that the gentleman from Indiana was reading from to the committee is not in the report. That is the information upon which he is basing this argument.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The table from which I read is in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, on page 25. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to call attention to the hearings, showing the difference in the cost of the collection of customs and that of internal revenue. The percentage of cost of collecting the customs is one-third more than it is for the collection of internal revenue.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the gentleman read the list.

Mr. HEMENWAY. It is too long to read, but I will put it in the RECORD.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I was absent from the room at the beginning of this discussion. I understand the question was asked whether any attempt has ever been made to remedy this state of things.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The question was asked, and I could not answer it.

Mr. PAYNE. In 1898 Mr. Gage, Secretary of the Treasury, reported these matters fully and in detail, and that report was sent to the Committee on Ways and Means. Afterwards there was a hearing had there in reference to those matters, and we endeavored to frame a bill; but because of the opposition there was to it we did not succeed in agreeing upon any bill to cut off any ports; we did not succeed in bringing in any such bill. Secretary Shaw also made a recommendation in his report to this Congress. The matter was brought up at the last meeting of the Committee on Ways and Means and a direction made for further investigation of the subject.

There is no doubt but that some of these ports ought to be cut off. They cost a good deal of money. I think one port collected 70 cents when the cost of collection was three or four hundred dollars. Some of them are inland ports, and, as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] has well said, there is no excuse for keeping up the inland ports where the cost of collection is more than the revenue. There is more excuse for a seaport, because very often the collector there is able to prevent smuggling. The question arises whether all of that business could not as well be done by a subcollector as by a collector with a full corps of officials. I believe myself it is a matter which ought to be thoroughly investigated and that some bill ought to be brought before the House remedying this. It is a useless expense in a great many cases, and it is an exorbitant expense in other cases, and where, if the ports are not cut off, a subport might be made, with a much smaller force and with a great deal less expense.

Of course the members of the committee will readily see that where there are ports scattered along the seacoast in which vessels may enter there is danger of smuggling unless a United States officer is about; but a deputy collector at a subport can prevent smuggling just as well as a collector with a larger salary and a whole corps of officials. The collectors in some of the small ports receive more salary than the deputy collectors to-day.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Oh, not always.

Mr. PAYNE. No, I think not; but it is not gauged on the amount collected, else some of them would not receive more than a dollar of salary during the whole year.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. The object of a port is to prevent smuggling at that particular port.

Mr. PAYNE. Yes; at some of the small ports. I think perhaps at most of these places along the seacoast there should be a subport, but there is no use of a full army of officials to look after smuggling.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. I am very confident that there are many ports in Maine where the current expenses are less than they would be if a deputy collector were sent there under the civil-service rules.

Mr. HEMENWAY. These same men would stay there as deputy collectors.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Their pay would be very much enlarged.

Mr. BURKETT. They would not have to do it under this bill.

Mr. PAYNE. The House can regulate the pay by legislation. A large portion of these were cut off before.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. The pay of deputy collectors is about the same—four or five dollars a day.

Mr. PAYNE. The pay of a collector is, of course, greater than the pay of a deputy collector.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Not at all.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not think the comparison between the collection of customs and internal revenue is hardly fair as to the amount of expense. On account of the larger revenue from customs the percentage would not be so much larger, as the gentleman indicates, and then the two branches of the service are so entirely distinct that it is not fair to compare them. The collection of the internal revenue is so much more easily gotten at in a great many instances that I do not think that comparison is quite fair.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I would ask the gentleman if ports and subports are not established by act of Congress?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes, they are.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The provision under consideration does not authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to abolish any ports or subports, but it provides that he may consolidate customs districts, and if a district with a port were consolidated with another district that port would become a subport by operation of law or by act of the President, would it not? What would be the status?

Mr. PAYNE. I have not noticed the provision in this bill, but when the matter was presented in 1898 the Treasury Department drew a very elaborate bill, and in that bill established and reestablished ports and subports all over the United States, of course eliminating some of these smaller ports, where the expense was so large in proportion to the collection, and placing ports where the Secretary of the Treasury thought there ought to be ports. I have sent for that report of the Secretary of the Treasury, but they do not seem to be able to find it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. This bill has a provision giving the President a broad discretion to rearrange and consolidate districts throughout the country without limitation, providing that there shall be no more than 123 collection districts altogether.

Mr. PAYNE. I would be glad to have that provision of the law read.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will read it:

The President is hereby authorized to establish convenient districts for the collection of revenue from customs, and for that purpose may subdivide any State or Territory within or appurtenant to the United States, or may unite two or more States or Territories within or appurtenant to the United States, or any part or parts thereof, into one district, and may from time to time alter said districts: Provided, That there shall be no more than 123 collection districts.

The gentleman will notice that this gives the President unlimited power to consolidate and reorganize, but there is no authority, of course, to close a port or to change a port from the status of a port to that of a subport, because that status is fixed by act of Congress, as I understand.

Mr. PAYNE. I should doubt very much whether that provision would remedy the evil. We have now before the committee a proposition to establish some subports in the State of Washington and also a recommendation by the Secretary of the Treasury to remove the principal port from Port Townsend to Seattle, both in the same customs district. We are met by a portion of the Representatives from that State who desire that the old port at Port Townsend, where there are about 2,500 people and a very small quantity of imports—1 or 2 per cent of the whole amount—continued, instead of being transferred to Seattle, where over 50 per cent of the imports are received, so that there would be an obvious saving to the Government on the transportation of the money that goes to the subtreasury at San Francisco by placing the port where the commerce is. This is a matter which it seems to me ought to have most careful investigation, and a bill in regard to it should be carefully framed.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. I should like to ask the gentleman another question. I see by looking over the list of those ports where the cost of collection is more than the amount of revenue received that the cost in thirteen of them is considerably less than $1,000 and at some less than $500. Now, if a collectorship is necessary where the Government receives but $1,100 or $1,200——

Mr. PAYNE. I think the aggregate of cost, at least as shown in the report for 1898, if not the present report, was some $150,000, while the amount collected, if I remember rightly, was only $10,000 or $12,000. I would not be absolutely sure about the amount; but it cost perhaps ten times as much to make the collections as the amount collected.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. But if an officer is necessary at those points, would you decrease the cost any by this arrangement?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not wish to trespass on the time of the gentleman from Indiana, who, I understand, has disposed of a portion of his time, so I will not interrupt him further.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I have called attention to this item now. When we reach it on the bill, I shall ask, if necessary, for more than five minutes of discussion—say two hours or whatever time may be necessary. My object in calling attention to it now is that the House may have an opportunity to look the matter over while the general discussion goes on.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What is the item?

Mr. HEMENWAY. The item for the consolidation of collection districts, on page 13.

Mr. BOWERS. Will the gentleman allow me a moment? I notice it is here provided that there shall be no more than 123 collection districts. Can the gentleman tell us how many collection districts there are now?

Mr. HEMENWAY. One hundred and sixty-five.

Mr. BOWERS. The gentleman, a few moments ago, in stating the cost of collecting internal revenue as compared with the cost of collecting customs duties, stated that it cost 33⅓ per cent more to collect the customs than the internal revenue. I take it the gentleman is aware that there is performed in every custom-house a large amount of services for American vessels for which no charge is made to the vessel, the expense being paid by the Government, and going to make up, in the smaller ports, the salary of the collector.

Mr. HEMENWAY. In the Internal-Revenue Department many inspectors are necessarily employed, and yet their services result, apparently, in no direct collections for the Government.

Mr. BOWERS. I understand that; but the inquiry I desired to make was whether the cost of these services rendered to American vessels and paid by the Government has been added as a part of the salary of the collector.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to call attention to the next item of legislation on this bill. It is in regard to the public building at Macon, Ga. It appears that on the site purchased there there is a livery stable which can be converted into a building that will be all right for the post-office, thus avoiding the necessity of paying rent on another building. We have authorized certain repairs to that building, so that the post-office may be moved into it while the new one is being constructed.

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not think the gentleman has stated exactly the conditions under which this appropriation is to be made.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Then I ask the gentleman from Georgia to make a statement of the matter, as he is familiar with it.

Mr. BARTLETT. In 1900 and 1901 there were appropriated regularly for rent of temporary quarters $5,000 in one year and $6,000 in the other. After the appropriation had been made Congress increased the appropriation for the building there, and that made it necessary to buy for the purposes of the site additional land adjoining the present site. Upon that site there is located a building which, if properly put in order, would answer all the purposes of a post-office and save the Government at least $4,000 a year. This appropriation merely authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to use money already appropriated for the purposes of temporary quarters, so that the Government can get its quarters more cheaply than it otherwise could.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The gentleman has stated the substance of this change.

On page 50 of the bill we recommend this:

That hereafter no part of any money appropriated shall be used in payment of per diem compensation to any clerk for attendance in court, except for days when the court is actually in session opened in the presence of the judge, which fact shall be certified in the approval of the account.

That is to correct an abuse that now exists, where a clerk will keep a court open and put a little entry on the docket each day, keeping the court constantly open in order to draw $5 per diem. This practice evidently was not contemplated at the time the law was passed, and it is certainly an abuse, and we seek to remedy it.

The next item is:

That the payment to officers and men severally entitled of the judgments, herein appropriated for, of the Court of Claims for bounty for destruction of enemy's vessels, under section 4635 of the Revised Statutes, be made on settlements by the Auditor for the Navy Department in the manner prescribed by law and Treasury regulations for the payment of prize money, the distribution of such individual share to be in accordance with the orders, rules, and finding of the Court of Claims.

And hereafter in all cases of final judgments and awards rendered against the United States by the Court of Claims, and of final judgments rendered against the United States by the circuit and district courts of the United States, payment thereof under appropriations made by Congress shall be made on settlements by the auditor for the Department or branch of the public service having jurisdiction over the subject-matter out of which the claims arose.

Under the Dockery law or present accounting system they have to be paid through the Auditor's office for the State Department, and there is every reason why they should be paid through the Auditor's office from which they went.

Now, there is just one other item on this bill to which I desire to call attention, and then I shall be through with my statement. That is the item of mileage.

At the extra session of Congress there was reported from the Committee on Appropriations a resolution making the mileage then appropriated for available for the extra session.

A similar resolution was offered in the Fifty-third Congress by Mr. Holman, who was then the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. The mileage was made available and was paid for attendance on the extra session. At the regular session which followed, Mr. Hayes, of Iowa, offered on the floor of the House an amendment for mileage of Members of the House of Representatives and Delegates from Territories, $130,000, for the second session of the Fifty-third Congress.

To that, Mr. Wells, then a Member of Congress, made the point of order. There was a long discussion, which finally resulted in a ruling by the Chair, in which the Chair held that the point of order was not well taken, and that the amendment was in order on the bill, that it was an appropriation authorized by law.

In the Fifty-fifth Congress there was an extra session, and the same procedure was had: a joint resolution was passed making the mileage available for the extra session of Congress, and at the following regular session an item passed upon the appropriation bill without debate, no one raising any question against the item in the House, providing for mileage for that regular session of Congress.

Now, the Committee on Appropriations, following the precedents laid down by the Fifty-third Congress and the Fifty-fifth Congress, and following the ruling of the Chair in the Fifty-third Congress, report in this bill an item for mileage, and simply say to the House, "Now it is up to you." We have followed the precedents laid down in the Fifty-third and the Fifty-fifth Congresses. Under our construction of the ruling in the Fifty-third Congress and of the action of the Fifty-fifth Congress, this mileage is authorized by law. In fact that was the exact point passed upon by the Chair in the Fifty-third Congress, and we have put it on the bill. The House can determine whether or not they want to accept the mileage.

I will say in addition to that that the other question arises which is made by some gentlemen, that this is one continuous session of Congress; that there has been no adjournment of the special session of Congress. That is a question which the House must determine for itself; but the Committee on Appropriations bring this item in here for the consideration of the House.

Mr. BINGHAM. Following the law.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time, and will print as a part of my remarks the following.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, January 18, 1904.

The CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS,
House of Representatives.

SIR: As requested by the committee, your attention is directed to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1903, page 25, in which reference is made to forty-seven ports where the cost of collection of $1 exceeds $1. Attention is also directed to pages 110, 111, 112, and 113 of the same volume, which show in detail the customs business of the country. It will be observed that the average cost to collect a dollar is $0.0339+. By reference to the table on page 109 of the same volume it will be found that the average cost to collect a dollar of internal revenue is $0.021.

With the data available in the Treasury Department at the present moment, no satisfactory plan of consolidation of districts to reduce the cost of collection per dollar of customs receipts can be recommended, nor in the light of past experience is it deemed advisable to suggest a detailed and arbitrary reorganization of customs districts. In the first session of the Fifty-second Congress Mr. Harter, on January 12, 1892, introduced a bill authorizing the consolidation of customs-collection districts, which was read twice and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, but never became a law. It provided specifically for a reorganization of the customs districts. A copy of the bill is inclosed herewith for the information of the committee.

Previous to 1876 there were 183 internal-revenue districts. In 1876 and 1877 legislation now appearing as section 3141 of the Revised Statutes was enacted. Through its operation the number of internal-revenue districts has been reduced to 66, and the cost of collection steadily lowered. Section 3141 of the Revised Statutes reads as follows:

"For the purpose of assessing, levying, and collecting the taxes provided by the internal-revenue laws, the President may establish convenient collection districts, and for that purpose he may subdivide any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, or may unite two or more States or Territories into one district, and may from time to time alter said districts: Provided, That the number of districts in any State shall not exceed the number of Representatives in Congress to which such State was entitled in the Thirty-seventh Congress, except in such States as were entitled to an increased representation in the Thirty-eighth Congress, in which States the number of districts shall not exceed the number of Representatives to which any such State was so entitled: And provided further, That in the State of California the President may establish a number of districts not exceeding the number of Senators and Representatives to which said State was entitled in the Thirty-seventh Congress."

The act of March 3, 1877, limited the maximum number of internal-revenue collection districts to 126, and that limit still exists, but has never been reached. That portion of the act bearing on the subject is as follows:

"From and after the 30th day of June next there shall be no more than 126 collection districts; and it shall be the duty of the President, and he is hereby authorized and directed, to reduce the internal-revenue districts to not exceeding the number aforesaid in the manner heretofore provided by law."

This was a provision following an appropriation for salaries and expenses of collectors in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878.

It is respectfully suggested that authority similar to that given in section 3141 for the consolidation and reorganization of internal-revenue districts be given to the executive department of the Government for the consolidation and reorganization of customs districts. It is further suggested that a provision to this effect, carrying such authority, might properly be inserted in the urgent deficiency bill now under consideration before your committee. In this connection it is suggested that the permanent appropriation for the collection of customs be increased from $5,500,000 to $8,000,000. This, together with the estimated amount which will probably be received from miscellaneous receipts, would make a sum sufficiently large to cover the estimated expenditures; and with a proviso that any unexpended portion of the appropriation shall be covered back into the Treasury there will be no necessity for a deficiency appropriation of any kind. In the meantime, if authority be given to the executive department to reorganize the districts, undoubtedly a considerable saving could be effected and the various districts of the country put on a business basis, the cost of each one being apportioned on a basis commensurate with its business.

If such authority is granted to the Department, there is no probability of the absolute abolition of independent ports. Scores of places, however, which are now independent ports would be made subports, attached to some principal port which is now self-supporting, and placed in a customs district which is now self-sustaining. The receipts of all the small ports would thereafter be consolidated with the receipts of the larger port, and the expenses reduced to those absolutely necessary to transact the business in a satisfactory manner.

At each of the subports a sufficient force would be retained to conduct the business and police the territory to which they are assigned. The reorganization of the districts would be in the interest of commerce and importers, inasmuch as a chief customs officer of experience would be in charge of all the ports of the district and the practice would be uniform. Many errors arising at small ports that are now brought to the attention of the Department too late to correct would be eliminated entirely.

Recent data relative to the workings of the immediate-transportation law are not available to the extent of showing the proportion of the immediate-transportation business compared with the ordinary business of the port. The item of cost due to the extension of the immediate-transportation provision to ports where no business is done is inconsiderable for the reason that no additional help is required when no additional business is transacted.

Respectfully,

R. B. ARMSTRONG,
Assistant Secretary.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana reserves the balance of his time. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] is recognized.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield sixty minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia yields sixty minutes to the gentleman from Alabama, who is recognized for that time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I should say anything on this bill were it not for the fact that I am a member of the subcommittee that reported it, and I desire to make a few statements to the House as to my views on the items contained in the bill.

Among other things that the subcommittee examined into at the time of the hearings upon the bill was the question of carriage hire. A number of heads of Departments were before the committee and testified in reference to the use of carriages in the Departments. The testimony showed that some of the carriages used in the Departments were very necessarily and properly used. There was other testimony going to show that carriages were used by persons for their private use that were not used for the benefit of the Government, and that they were unnecessary.

I think that the whole testimony taken together demonstrated one fact very clearly. That is that a system has grown up in the Government departments and bureaus in Washington and in Army and Navy post stations away from here, of allowing heads of departments and officers to use the contingent funds allowed to them by Congress for other purposes for the purchase and maintenance of carriages and horses for their own private use at Government expense; that is not necessary and is improper. I do think, however, that there are certain cases in which the officers of the Government ought to be provided with carriages. For instance, take the Secretary of State and the Assistant Secretaries of State. A real part of their official functions is to make calls and answer calls of foreign diplomats, and to attend certain diplomatic functions. They are paid a very small compensation, and I think it would be entirely proper for the Government to furnish them with carriages and horses.

But, on the other hand, from the testimony it seems that the heads of certain bureaus have been using private carriages and maintaining them out of the contingent fund provided by Congress for other purposes. I think that is all wrong. But it has grown up to be a custom, and I think there is but one way of getting at it and remedying the evil, and that is for Congress expressly—not for the Appropriations Committee, for we have not the jurisdiction in this matter, but for the House, which has jurisdiction of the case—to pass a specific law saying that no fund appropriated for contingent expenses shall be used to maintain private carriages, or public carriages for that matter, of Government officials, and then by express law state what officials of this Government are entitled to have carriages and appropriate for them, for the pay and maintenance of carriages and horses as provided by law, and stop the indiscriminate use of the contingent funds that are appropriated for other purposes.

In the bill there is another item that I think it necessary to call to the attention of the House, and that is an appropriation of $100,000 put in this bill that is not of necessity an urgent deficiency. It is $100,000 to survey the Alaskan boundaries. As Members know, that question has been in dispute for many years. The tribunal selected has finally decided that question, has ordered a survey made and certain monuments erected. The more quickly it is done, the better. If we wait for the regular appropriation bill, it would be several months before the work begun. Therefore the committee saw proper to put an appropriation in here of $100,000 in order that the survey might commence at once.

Then there is an item in here, a rather large appropriation, for the diplomatic service in Panama. It is an item proposing to pay the minister of the United States at Panama a salary of $10,000 a year, and appropriates for his salary for the balance of the fiscal year—that is, up to the 30th of June, 1904. Now, I want to say that I voted for that appropriation in committee, and shall vote for it in the House. The reason that I voted for it in the committee and shall vote for it in the House is this: The President of the United States has appointed Mr. Buchanan minister to Panama. The Senate of the United States has confirmed that action. He is a governmental officer duly and properly commissioned, fulfilling his functions as representative of the United States at a place where, at the present time, it is very necessary for us to have an able and active officer to look after the affairs of the United States, regardless of what we may think as to the action of the President or the Executive in reference to the Panama revolution.

In view of the fact that this man was properly appointed, confirmed by the Senate, and that we need a diplomatic officer there, I voted to pay him his salary. The reason we fix $10,000 as his salary, which may seem to be a large salary for a diplomatic officer in so small a country, was this: The testimony before the committee showed that Panama was an exceedingly unhealthy place; that a great many of our consuls-general had died there, and, as one witness said, part of it was salary and some of it, a large part of it, was life insurance.

And under these circumstances the committee did not believe that a salary of $10,000 was too large in order to get an intelligent and able and efficient Government agent at that place.

Now, in reference to the item for the collection of customs revenues, the chairman of the committee has stated the action of the committee in bringing in an amendment in this bill that is subject to a point of order under the rules of the House, but it is evident that it is an amendment that is very badly needed. The Secretary of the Treasury has shown that under the present system of collecting revenues from customs it costs something like 3 cents and 4 mills to collect each dollar of customs revenue, whereas, on the other hand, it only costs 2 cents and 1 mill to collect the internal revenue.

Some years ago it cost just as much to collect the internal revenue as it does to collect the customs revenue now, but a law was passed through Congress authorizing the President of the United States to consolidate the revenue-collecting districts. By that means economy was created. The cost of collecting this revenue was cut down to a total cost of 2 cents and 1 mill to a dollar. Now, the Secretary of the Treasury asks for a deficiency appropriation of $2,400,000 on this bill—a deficiency appropriation. When he is asked, Why is this large deficiency, and why he can not collect this money at a less expense, he says because the existing law requires him to keep revenue collectors at certain ports where the expense to the Government is greater than the revenue collected; but he states that he is bound by the law; that he must obey the law, and therefore he can not reduce the cost of collection, and for that reason he asks for this amendment to be passed in order that the President may consolidate the ports of entry. Change full ports into subports, and thereby economize and reduce the cost of collection, and he intimates that he can probably cut it down somewhere in the neighborhood of 2 cents on the dollar, as he has the internal revenue, and save the Government something over a million dollars in the collection of its revenue.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I would like to interrupt the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I want to ask the gentleman from Alabama—because I am interested in this item, as one of the ports of entry of my district might be affected—does the Secretary of the Treasury or does the committee suggest any particular ports of entry or customs districts which are to be abolished or consolidated?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not at all.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I am particularly interested in the ports at Beaufort and Newbern, N. C., and I trust there is no possibility under this legislation that these ports will be consolidated with any other port or placed under deputy collectors, because they are important ports and old ports and customs districts and have been in existence for many years.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state to the gentleman from North Carolina this legislation can only pass by unanimous consent of every man in this House.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. In other words, the item is subject to a point of order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is subject to the point of order, but I say it is wise to let it stay in this bill or in some other way to enact it, because clearly it is costing more money to collect our revenue than it ought to cost, and the reform is needed. I will read to the gentleman just what the law proposed is:

> The President is hereby authorized to establish convenient districts for the collection of revenue from customs, and for that purpose may subdivide any State or Territory within or appurtenant to the United States, or may unite two or more States or Territories within or appurtenant to the United States, or any part or parts thereof, into one district, and may, from time to time, alter said districts: Provided, That there shall be no more than 123 collection districts.

Now, I will say to the gentleman from North Carolina, that is exactly what Congress did when it passed a law in reference to the collection of internal revenue and authorized the President to consolidate districts. It would be a very difficult thing for Congress to pick out the districts to be consolidated, because we are all naturally looking after our own. If the question came up here of consolidating a port in my district or in yours or one in another, we would soon have a combination here where we would all vote to save our own ports, and therefore vote as a unit against the bill, not that we care for the other ports, but to protect ourselves, so that no legislation could be passed.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. There may be possibly ports of entry that ought to be abolished in the interest of economy, but when it comes to the ports of entry in North Carolina, such as Beaufort, Newbern, Wilmington, Elizabeth City—few in number, but important—certainly these ports ought not to be abolished. [Laughter and applause.]

If this item is subject to a point of order, then I shall be compelled to make the point of order.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman tell us how much salary is paid to the customs officer at the various large ports in the United States—say New York, Boston, Philadelphia, and San Francisco?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can not recollect them, and my time will not permit me to go through it. I will refer the gentleman to the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury contained in House Document No. 269, which will give him that information.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am familiar with the comparison between the cost of collection of customs and that of internal revenue, but I thought we might economize by cutting down some of these salaries at the large ports of the country. I understand some of them are as high as $20,000 and some $30,000. It seems to me that we ought to begin this economy at the top rather than to go out into the woods and into the little places around in the country and close ports in this summary way.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama what amount the Secretary estimated would be saved by this provision?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Secretary of the Treasury did not estimate the exact amount, but in his testimony before the committee he intimated that by this change he could probably cut down the cost of collection to what it cost per dollar to collect the internal revenue, which would be a saving of about 1½ cents on a dollar, amounting in the total to about one million and a half dollars.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That would still leave a deficiency of $900,000 on the regular appropriation?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; in relative figures it would, although it is just to say that there has been a deficiency on this appropriation since 1872. Congress has adopted the custom of making an annual appropriation of $5,500,000 for the collection, and then put the balance in the deficiency bill. So there really has been a deficiency all the time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Has the gentleman at hand the deficiency for the previous year?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The deficiency for 1903 was $2,300,000. The estimated deficiency for this year is $2,400,000. It has been growing for many years, and will continue to grow unless some reformation is made in the collection of these revenues. The Committee on Appropriations admit that this is not within their jurisdiction; that this legislation is not in order if objected to. Any man can knock it out on a point of order, but when we considered the need of holding down expenditures, and the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury has recommended this legislation, we felt that it should be presented by the committee of the House, either for them to act now or hereafter, as the House deems proper.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SMALL. I would like to ask the gentleman if he is not aware that in all these collection districts, both where there is a full collector and a deputy collector, these officers have various services to perform in connection with the licensing, registering, and enrolling of vessels and the changing of masters, and that this proposed amendment of the law contains no provision for the appointment of deputy collectors? Is not the gentleman aware that great inconvenience will result?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman from North Carolina misunderstands the amendment. This amendment provides that the President shall have authority to create ports into subports. Of course a subport will carry the same number of officers it has now. If the President thinks, in his discretion, that a port ought to remain a full port, it will have all the men that it carries now. If he thinks it only needs the officers of a subport, why he will make it a subport. In other words, he combines not only the ports, but he combines these collection districts where they have the immediate right of transportation, where a great deal of unnecessary expense is now created.

Mr. SMALL. At any point where a deputy collector exists now it will rest in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury or the President whether that shall be continued as a port or a subport?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Unquestionably.

Mr. SMALL. Is it not true that in any of these subports great inconvenience will be created in connection with the service to American vessels if they should be abolished?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to my friend that I have no doubt that the people of every town in which a full port is located would object to having it made a subport. Of course in every actual port on the seashore, I take it, the President would not abolish the station entirely. He might reduce a full port to a subport. I take it further that the people living in a place having a full port now, if it was reduced to a subport, would feel that they had been done a great hardship; but that would not make it wrong; somebody must exercise the discretion.

This House ought itself by a bill reduce the number of ports and reform the matter, or they ought to give the Executive the right to reform it. Now, the committee does not say to the House you must reform it one way or the other, but we simply say that the executive officer of this Government, the Secretary of the Treasury, has said that he could not economize under the present law, that the law must be changed, and that he asked for some authority to change it so that the cost of collection can be reduced, and he suggests this provision of the law. That is all.

Mr. SMALL. Now, I want to illustrate to the gentleman from Alabama what an injustice this may entail.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will ask the gentleman from North Carolina not to do that for my time is running. I am glad to answer any question, but the gentleman can make his speech in his own time.

Mr. SMALL. Very well. I want to say that I do not think the committee has thoroughly considered this question.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman who argues that there should be a change in the law why he or some member of this committee does not bring in a bill for that purpose if they are convinced of this fact, and not undertake to make the change in this bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have just stated to the House that this committee simply reported to this House what the Secretary of the Treasury said was necessary. We call the attention of the House to the fact that it is not in order on this bill, that it can not come in here except by unanimous consent. If the unanimous consent of every Member of this House is given, then it is all right to have it here. If the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY] does not think this legislation ought to be had on this bill, when the question is reached he ought to rise in his seat and take the responsibility of killing it, as he can do.

Mr. FINLEY. Does the gentleman think that the legislation that is incorporated in the bill is sufficient and broad enough to cover the question in its entirety?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I can not say that myself from my own knowledge. The Secretary of the Treasury seems to think that it is. The committee did not go into a very full investigation of the question. It is not the business of the Appropriation Committee to do so, but it was our business when the matter was called to our attention, and we were told that we could not economize unless there was some legislation to enable them to economize, to report those facts to the House, and that is all this committee has done.

Mr. HERMANN. If the gentleman will permit me, I would like to ask him a question. Is it not a fact, under the present reorganization system of the collection districts, that in all those districts where there are full collectorships and the receipts are small the salary paid the collector is so small that the services could not be performed for any less compensation, even by a deputy?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. My friend is asking me something I know nothing about except as I get it from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury in his report in 1903—and it will be found on page 35—reports that there were some fifty-odd ports that were not paying, costing more to maintain than they collected, and that they ought to be consolidated. I do not know. It is a technical question. I will say candidly that I am not informed on the subject.

Mr. HERMANN. In my own State——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, I will ask my friend not to make a speech in my time.

Mr. HERMANN. Just one remark further. In my own State there are two collection districts where the entire receipts, I presume, do not equal one-half of the compensation that is paid the officers employed to supervise the collection; and yet at the same time the maximum compensation does not exceed $100 a month—a compensation for which you can not obtain the services of any person, let him be known as a collector, a deputy, or even as a clerk.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I know nothing about that.

Mr. HERMANN. There could be no reform in abolishing such collection districts as those.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I know nothing about that fact.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman takes his seat, I would like to have him call attention to such matters in the bill as are matters of new legislation and subject to the point of order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will. Mr. Chairman, that is all I have to say on the question of the collection of customs revenue. I will endeavor to call attention to the other matters of new legislation in this bill, as suggested by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. The first item of new legislation is the question of authorizing the board of commissioners of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition to hire rooms in this city.

In reference to all other expositions heretofore the commissioners have been allowed to take out of the general fund of their appropriation money for the purpose of hiring storerooms and offices in the city of Washington to enable them to assemble the Government exhibits. The Comptroller of the Currency has recently held that under the last appropriation they can not use any of that money for that purpose. That will be found on page 3 of his report.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How much money does it take?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is a general provision allowing them to use so much as may be needed for that purpose from the funds already appropriated. It is simply to enable them, out of the appropriation already made of $800,000—the Comptroller having held that they could not use any of that—to secure rooms in which to assemble exhibits before shipping them away. Then comes a provision to allow the Government to rent a building in Macon, Ga., to be used as a temporary post-office while it is tearing down the old building and rebuilding another one, which provision is proper and necessary.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I will state that the gentleman makes a mistake when he says it is to permit the Government to rent a building. It simply permits the Government to use the money already appropriated for rent to repair its own building and put it in shape so that it can be used for a post-office. I do not think it is subject to the point of order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, we put it in the bill as new legislation, but there is no reason in the world why the Government should not be allowed this privilege, and I suppose nobody on earth will object.

Mr. BARTLETT. It saves the Government $4,000 a year for two years.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The committee shows it will be a saving to the Government, and it is necessary for these people to have some place in which to conduct their post-office business while the new building is being constructed.

The next provision of new legislation is this: A deficiency appropriation was asked for by the Department of Justice for per diem for clerks, and, as shown by the testimony, it was a rather large deficiency. We called for a statement to show the cause of this large deficiency, and it seems that when the courts are not in session, if a judge enters an order at his place of residence and sends it to the clerk to be entered on the docket of the court, the clerk can charge the Government $5 a day for each day that he enters one of these orders, regardless of whether the court is actually in session or not. In other words, if the judge at his home makes a half dozen orders and sends them down to the clerk to be entered up, the clerk can enter one each day and claim that the court was open on each day, although there was neither judge nor jury in attendance and nobody there but the clerk, who receives $5 a day for doing so. At the suggestion of the Department of Justice, the committee have inserted in this bill a provision that will hereafter prevent this practice. And the same provision was made to apply to the district court in the District of Columbia.

Those are the questions of new legislation arising on this bill, unless the provision for the payment of salary to a minister to Panama be regarded as new legislation (and the committee did not so regard it) and unless the provision in this bill for mileage be regarded as new legislation. The majority of the committee did not so regard it, although I do.

Another provision to which I think it proper to call the attention of the House is the appropriation of $131,500 by way of deficiency for the Marine Corps. This deficiency was created by the necessity, or what the President determined was the necessity, of sending a number of marines to Panama—a provision for their traveling expenses, necessary supplies, etc., down there, which have been used from funds that would have been available to carry the Marine Corps through the balance of this fiscal year. It left a deficit; and unless we make an appropriation now, there will not be funds available to maintain that corps for the balance of this year. So that the committee felt it necessary under these circumstances to make this appropriation in order to maintain the marines until the 1st of July next.

Then we come, Mr. Chairman, to the question of mileage. I want to state that I differed with my colleagues on the committee as to the legal status of this proposition. The committee reported the bill to the House with the understanding that every member of the committee should be at liberty to take whatever position he thought proper on this question. Most of the members of the committee came to the conclusion that the existing law is that Members of Congress shall receive this mileage. Those members hold that we have had two sessions of Congress, and that, whether it was right or wrong for us to receive the mileage for November, the law requires that it should be paid now and that it was necessary for the committee to report it, as it was carrying out existing law.

Mr. Chairman, I differed with my colleagues on that proposition, because I contend that there has been but one session of Congress. If we had had two sessions, then I admit the question would come before Congress as to whether we should take the money or not—a question for every man to determine for himself. But if we have had but one session of Congress, if the session in which we were engaged in November is the same session in which we are now engaged in January, then there is no rhyme or reason, technical or ethical, why we should appropriate $145,000 for mileage for Members of Congress.

Now, I do not intend to tire you with a long argument on this question, but I think it is but justice to myself and justice to the House to state my views, as I hold them, in reference to this question.

I contend that under the Constitution of the United States a session of Congress can come to an end in but one of three ways: First, we can adjourn, under the Constitution, by a concurrent resolution of the two Houses; second, we must necessarily adjourn when the end of the term for which we were elected arrives on the 4th of March, and, third, when the two Houses differ as to whether they want to adjourn or not then it is within the discretion of the President to adjourn us to such time as he may see proper. All this is provided for in the Constitution of the United States, and these are the only means by which the two Houses can adjourn under the Constitution of the United States when they have once assembled.

That is practically admitted by all up to that point. But the gentlemen who say we have had two sessions of Congress say that that is true, that a regular adjournment by the action of Congress can be had only in that way, but that the Constitution provides that you must meet on the first Monday in December every year in regular session, and that when that time comes you have got to start a new session.

Now, if that is so, of course we have had two sessions of Congress, but if it is not so we have not. Now, what does the Constitution say?

> The Congress shall assemble at least once in every year. Such meeting shall be on the first Monday in December, unless they shall by law appoint a different day.

What is the intention of that provision? Congress shall assemble at least once in every year. Is not that the governing clause in the sentence? The writers of the Constitution intended that we should be here at least once every year, but they did not make it binding on a particular day. They appointed that day provided we did not choose to assemble on some other day; but if we are already assembled, where is there any violation of the Constitution in remaining assembled? There is no reason why we should adjourn. The object was not that we should create a new session of Congress and start in on a new term on the first Monday of each December, but the object of the Constitution was to have us in session at least once every year. We could change the date and order the session to begin in August, if we wanted to, and there would be no compulsion on our part to meet here on the first Monday in December. I say, therefore, there is no authority given by the Constitution, or given by Congress, to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of this House to declare the two Houses adjourned and then call them together again.

More than that, Mr. Chairman, if I were alone in this proposition, if it were a new question, I might have some doubt upon it. It might be open to some such construction. But I have taken the trouble to examine into the precedents in the past and I find that the Second Congress of the United States, in its second session, met on the 5th day of November, 1792, and remained in continuous session until March 2, 1793; that it passed by the first Monday in December, and that not one single word was said by any Member of that Congress about finding an infinitesimal space of time between 12 o'clock noon on the first Monday in December of that year and 12 o'clock noon on the first Monday in December of that year that divided the session of Congress under the Constitution. Not one word was said about it. Many able and distinguished men constituted that body.

I find that there were among the membership Roger Sherman and Charles Ellsworth, of Connecticut; Charles Carroll and William Pinckney, of Maryland; Fisher Ames and Elbridge Gerry, of Massachusetts; Rufus King, of New York; Nathaniel Macon, of North Carolina; Robert Morris and Frederick A. Muhlenberg, of Pennsylvania, and James Madison and James Monroe, of Virginia—all distinguished men, many of them signers of the Declaration of Independence or members of the original Constitutional Convention. But none of those men when that momentous first Monday in December arrived found that there was an infinitesimal space of time in which one House could adjourn one session and start another in order that the Members of the Congress might receive mileage for the purpose of riding on the street car down to their hotels and back again. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But that is not all. The Third Congress of the United States in its second session assembled on the 3d day of November, 1794, and continued in session until March 3, 1795. The Fifth Congress met in its second session on November 13, 1797, and remained in continuous session until July 16, 1798. The Sixth Congress in its second session started on November 17, 1800, and remained in continuous session until March 3, 1801.

The Eighth Congress in its first session started on October 17, 1803, and remained in continuous session until March 27, 1804. The Tenth Congress assembled on the 26th day of October, 1807, and continued in session until April 25, 1808. The second session of that Congress met November 7, 1808, and remained in session until March 3, 1809. The Eleventh Congress met in its second session on November 27, 1809, and remained in session until May 1, 1810. The Twelfth Congress met in its first session November 4, 1811, and remained in continuous session until July 6, 1812. The second session of that Congress met on the 2d of November, 1812, and remained in session until March 3, 1813. The Thirteenth Congress met on September 19, 1814, and remained in session until March 2, 1815. The Fifteenth Congress met in its second session on November 16, 1818, and remained in session until March 3, 1819. The Sixteenth Congress met in its second session on November 13, 1820, and remained in continuous session until March 3, 1821.

Every one of these Congresses I have named met before the first Monday of December and was in session on the first Monday of December; and among all the line of distinguished men that occupied seats in the House and Senate of the United States during these Congresses not one single man arose in his seat or even thought there was an infinitesimal space of time that made it necessary for the Congress to adjourn, so that we would be authorized to arpropriate $145,000 for mileage. Not a single man in all those years, in all those Congresses, believed that it was their duty to assemble a new session of Congress on the first Monday in December when they were already in session.

Mr. BARTLETT. I desire to ask the gentleman from Alabama if it is not a fact that in 1857—I do not know whether the gentleman has carried his investigation down that far or not—that not only the House, but Congress, passed a law and enacted it into law, providing that on the first day of each session of Congress in each and any succeeding session, whether regular or called, that the Members of Congress should be paid on demand mileage?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I have not examined into that question. The gentleman seems to have done so. I have no doubt he is correct.

Mr. BARTLETT. I call the gentleman's attention particularly to the fact that in 1857 Congress, both the Senate and House of Representatives, passed an act, which was approved by the President, in which it is especially provided that every session, beginning with the first, without reference to how many there might be, but on the first day of every session Members should be paid their mileage upon claiming it. And is it not true that that continued to be the law down to 1866?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. My friend has evidently investigated this question and is familiar with it. But whether they paid themselves mileage or not has nothing to do with this question as to whether we have had one or two sessions. The law now very distinctly says we shall be paid for each regular session. If we have been in session since November down to the present time, if it has been one continuous session, there certainly is no reason at all for the payment of a second mileage.

I want to say that when you come down to the Fortieth Congress we find that that Congress assembled in extra session on March 4, 1867, and remained in session until December 2, 1867, at 11 o'clock and 50 minutes, when by concurrent resolution of the two Houses they adjourned, and they met ten minutes afterwards in another session, and they received but one mileage for the two sessions.

The point that I make is that the Members of that Congress believed it took the united action of the two Houses by a concurrent resolution to adjourn them. I find in the Forty-fifth Congress that they met on October 15 and run up to December 3, and a few minutes before noon on that day they adjourned by concurrent resolution, and then were again called together in regular session. I have gone through the Journals of every session of Congress since the beginning of the Government in which there were extra sessions. We have had sessions that overlapped the first Monday in December, and among the many distinguished men that were here not one of them ever called attention to the fact that they were compelled to adjourn and meet again when the first Monday in December was reached, or that the presiding officer of the Senate or the Speaker of the House could adjourn them without action by the House and Senate.

Now, I say that is the law, and if this question is ever presented to the courts of this land it will be so decided. Of course it can not be on the mileage question, because we are the sole judges of that. If we were to vote ourselves $10,000 apiece and the President of the United States will sign the bill, we could do it, and there is no check on earth except public sentiment. But if this question ever comes before the courts of this land—and it probably will with reference to the salaries of some of these appointees of the President who are awaiting confirmation—I have no doubt in the world the courts will decide that there has been but one continuous session of Congress since we assembled here in November. Now, if that is so, there is no reason in the world for the payment of this money.

There is no reason or law that I know of for any gentleman to contend we ought to have this mileage. Congress has not gone home. If we had adjourned and gone home and come back, I think the main object of the law regardless of technicalities would have been carried out, and the people contemplated when they elected us to pay our way here to Washington and to pay our way back again for ourselves and for our families, if we had adjourned long enough to go home. Some of the members may have gone home on private business or political exigencies may have carried them home, but the Congress of the United States was here; the Congress of the United States was here assembled; it was assembled at five minutes to 12, noon, on the first Monday in December, and the same Congress was assembled at noon on the first Monday of December of that day, and no fiction, such as the Speaker leaving the chair and calling the House to order again, would change that proposition and the law.

Mr. THAYER. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. THAYER. If I understand the gentleman correctly, his contention is that there has been, then, no lawful adjournment of the extra session up to this hour.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes. Now, whether you call it the regular session or the extra session, we are and have been in continued session.

Mr. THAYER. If the President called an extra session that everybody on earth knew was an extra session, why should we not have pay whenever that ends, if we are also in regular session——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If we had pay for the extra session and we had not been home and come back to earn any other pay——

Mr. THAYER. Then we should have no pay for the regular session; is that the gentleman's contention?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I say that we have been paid for this session of Congress, whether you call it extra or regular, whenever each one of us receives one mileage, and that is all we are entitled to.

Mr. THAYER. That is for the extra session.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I do not care whether you call it extra or regular.

Mr. THAYER. What do you call it?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I simply call it one mileage for one session of Congress. That is all we are entitled to.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman from Alabama permit an interruption?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I think if the gentleman will examine the law he will find we have already received mileage for the regular session. In other words, it was worded so as to anticipate the mileage of the regular session to let it be paid then.

Mr. THAYER. Well, I have not got mine for either yet, and I should like to have both. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. My friend is very candid about it, and I believe many would like to have it if it is proper.

Mr. THAYER. I think I am entitled to it.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. If one regular session of Congress ran into the second session of Congress, so that it was a continuous session, do you claim that because Congress was constantly in session no mileage should be paid?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I most certainly do, because, I say, mileage is granted for a specific purpose—that is, to take you and me home and to bring us back here. If we do not go home and come back, we are not entitled to be paid.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Say, though, the law provides that Congress may select a time for its regular session, which regular session ran into another, you claim there should be but one mileage for the entire Congress?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I say if we met the 5th day of March and stayed in continuous session until the 4th day of March two years afterwards, when we adjourn by law, we would be entitled to but one mileage, because the reason for which the mileage is awarded would not have taken place; that is, neither you nor I would have gone home. We may have gone home on a political exigency; we may have gone home to attend to some political affairs; but as Members of Congress we would not have returned home to our constituency, because Congress had not adjourned.

Mr. SMITH, of Iowa. What I wanted to get at was your idea of the law. Now, you claim, as I understand you, notwithstanding that the law says there shall be a session of Congress on the first Monday in December, if one should meet on the first Monday in December in one year and continue past the first Monday in December the next year, there would be but one session of Congress, and not two sessions of Congress.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I unquestionably say that, and the authorities I have cited vouch for it. Not one Congress, but a number of Congresses have passed the first Monday of December and made no claim that there was a new session, and made no claim for mileage.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I am not speaking of whether they made any claim, or whether they were entitled to a second mileage. Did they not always treat it as a new session?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly not, and I have cited instances. A dozen or fifteen Congresses down to the present time have gone along on, and their Journals have shown that the session began in October and ran until May, and it was simply the first session of that Congress.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. So I understood the gentleman; but the matter has never been decided because the facts have never existed before. The law provides for two regular sessions, one commencing the first Monday of December, and, if Congress continued in session after the time fixed for its second session, the gentleman holds that it is still the first session of Congress?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Unquestionably; there is no law otherwise.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama, because he has investigated this matter, is it not true that there never was an appropriation for mileage for the extra session eo nomine; was it not always the case that the resolution was introduced to make the mileage for the regular session immediately available?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is correct.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. And is it not true that we have already been paid the mileage of the regular session?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; if this is the regular session, we have been paid the mileage. But this is only one session; the Speaker had no power on earth to adjourn it. It was only ourselves by concurrent resolution that could do so. If the Speaker of the House could adjourn us, then we could violate the provision of the Constitution that says that we shall not adjourn for more than three days without the consent of the Senate. The form that we went through in the House and in the Senate was merely a form, and nothing but a form. The fact that the Journal is dated the second session of this Congress means nothing but mere form; and I have no doubt that the courts of this land will determine ultimately that we have not had but one session, and then, if it appears that we have voted ourselves two mileages, and taken two mileages at one session of Congress, I say it would put us in an embarrassing attitude, and one that I am not willing to remain in.

I do not intend to criticise my colleagues' action in this matter. They are just as fair men as I am; they are just as conscientious men as I am. They are just as capable of determining what is right and what is wrong as I am, but, for myself, I claim the privilege of voting against this resolution because I do not believe that I am entitled to two mileages; and I want to say that if you pass this resolution for two mileages I do not propose to take mine, but to allow it to be covered back into the Treasury on the 1st day of next July.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I want to understand the gentleman's position, because I am in sympathy with him. We met in extraordinary session on the 9th of November. Now, suppose we had adjourned by concurrent resolution on the 20th of November and gone home and came back here on the first Monday of December. What does the gentleman say about that?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would say then, under the law, that we had applied the mileage for the regular session for the first session. There would have been two sessions of Congress, and we might vote ourselves another mileage because we had been home and come back.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Could we do so under the law, according to the gentleman's construction? Suppose on the 20th of November we had gone home and come back to the regular session in December.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If we had not taken the December mileage in November, the law would carry it to us. But we have already been paid the mileage. We made the December mileage available to us in November, and we ought not to vote ourselves a new mileage. You passed a resolution in this House making the mileage that was due to us on the first Monday in December available and payable to ourselves in November.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. But suppose we had adjourned on the 20th of November and gone home, paid ourselves for the session, for the extra travel, and then came back on the first Monday of December, would we be entitled to a second mileage according to the gentleman's own construction?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There might be good reason if we went home and came back. I would be willing if I went home, if the extra session adjourned, and I was put to the expense of coming here with my family and taking them home, I would be perfectly willing to take it.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. But the view of the gentleman is that, not having adjourned at all and going right along in this continual session, we are not entitled to our mileage.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. We are not entitled to pay ourselves two mileages for one session of Congress.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. As a matter of fact we all know that Congress was here, that the Members were all here—certainly presumptively here—and we did not go home at the end of the extra session, but begun this regular session the following Monday—the first Monday in December. Now, should we in equity—I hope not in law, because I am utterly against this mileage proposition—should we as a matter of equity to ourselves pay ourselves the extra mileage when we were already here when Congress met in regular session, under the Constitution, December, 1903?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to my friend what I have just said, that so far as the equity is concerned I have decided that I shall vote against the bill, and if my brother Members of Congress pass it, that I will not take the mileage, but that it can be converted back into the Treasury.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That's right.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is the decision I have reached as to the equity in the matter, but I decide for no one but myself, and I have as high regard and respect for the decision of other Members of Congress in that respect as I have for my own, and I would not in any way reflect on any other Member of Congress because he looked at the question from a different attitude from mine.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. If the gentleman is correct in his contention about the law, he certainly is correct in his conclusion that we ought not to take the mileage. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I will ask that the gentleman be permitted to have five minutes longer.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I will yield the gentleman five minutes' time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. We want to get a correct understanding of the law so that we may act intelligently. If I understand the gentleman, his contention is that there has been but one session of Congress up to this time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is it.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. And there being but one, there ought not to be but one mileage paid.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Now, I call his attention to this section of the Constitution:

> The Congress shall assemble at least once in every year and such meeting shall be on the first Monday in December, unless they shall by law appoint a different date.

Now, Congress has not by law appointed a different date. The Constitution, therefore, fixes a particular time when the regular session of Congress must commence. As a matter of proper legal interpretation of the Constitution and of the law, is it not evident from this provision that if the President called a session of Congress previous to the first Monday in December that this called session must, by operation of the Constitution itself, expire on the first Monday in December regardless of the passage of a concurrent resolution to adjourn by Congress.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Evidently my friend was not here when I discussed that phase of the question.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I did not hear you, and I should like to hear now what the gentleman has to say about it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will not go through the full discussion. If my friend is interested in it, he will find it in the RECORD in the morning. I will say this: The position I take is that the object of that provision of the Constitution was merely to require that Congress should be in session at least once a year; that if it was already in session then the provision of the Constitution had been complied with. More than that, I cited numbers of instances of Congresses from the Second Congress down to the present day where they had met before the first Monday in December and had gone on in continuous session without anybody regarding that it was necessary to adjourn on the first Monday of December; where no one found that there was an infinitesimal space of time which required the adjournment of the two Houses, and where this question was not raised. It was considered one continuous session from the fall until the early spring.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Due to the fact that the question was not raised.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That may be true.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. And even if all that were true, does that afford an answer to the contention that the express provision of the Constitution requires the Congress to enter upon a regular session on the first Monday in December? We are now in the second session of the Fifty-eighth Congress. The first ended December 7, when the second, by the Constitution, began. The House and Senate recognize this fact and so dates the records.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. My friend interprets the Constitution from a different standpoint. I contend that the governing sentence in that clause is that Congress shall be in session at least once a year, and to insure that the Constitution fixes a date, unless it is otherwise fixed. I say that under the law, when the President fixed a different date and we remained in session until the first Monday in December, then the provision of the Constitution was complied with, as shown by all the precedents in the matter.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I make these suggestions to my friend only in order that we may discuss this matter together to see if we can reach a conclusion. I, however, differ very radically from the gentleman on the question of law involved and the construction of the Constitution, as is apparent. The President has no control of the meeting of Congress at its constitutional sessions.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Is it not a fact that in the case where Congress met in 1867 that was distinctly without the rule that would apply here, because Congress met in pursuance of a specific law and not at the call of the President at that time?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, the first meeting of Congress in 1867 took place on March 4.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Is it not an historical fact that owing to the differences that existed between Congress and the President the date for the meeting of Congress was fixed at that time by law, not by proclamation, and that under an act of Congress the Congress convened in extraordinary session?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I believe my friend is right.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. So that Congress did not meet in December, under the terms of the Constitution, but under the law which had fixed the date of the meeting.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But when Congress came to meet in December, for some reason—I do not know what—they wanted to adjourn and start a new session. It was not done for the purpose of drawing mileage, because the Congressmen did not take two mileages that year. But they did adjourn by concurrent resolution on the 2d day of December and met again on that day.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. As a matter of fact, the time of the meeting of Congress had been changed by a law.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is true. But take the Forty-fifth Congress, in 1877——

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. That is not a precedent, because they met in pursuance of law.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Fortieth Congress is not a precedent, then the Forty-fifth certainly is, when the Congress met regularly on a regular call by the President, as we did at the extra session in November last, and ran on until the 3d of December, when they adjourned by concurrent resolution (recognizing that a concurrent resolution was required) and then met again. In that case they did not adjourn for the purpose of claiming mileage, because the Members at that time accepted only one mileage.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 3341. An act authorizing the city of Nome, a municipal corporation organized and existing under chapter 21, title 3, of an act of Congress approved June 6, 1900, entitled "An act making further provision for a civil government for Alaska, and for other purposes," to construct a free bridge across the Snake River at Nome City, in the Territory of Alaska;

S. 540. An act providing for additional officers in the district of Chicago, in the collection district of Indiana and Illinois;

S. 2081. An act to provide for the appropriate marking of the graves of the soldiers and sailors of the Confederate army and navy, and for other purposes;

S. 1681. An act to provide for the modification of the project for the improvement of Bridgeport Harbor, Bridgeport, Conn.;

S. 2261. An act to amend section 4607 of the Revised Statutes;

S. 901. An act providing for the construction of a vessel of the first class for the Revenue-Cutter Service, to be stationed with headquarters at Honolulu, Hawaii;

S. 1748. An act to provide for the establishment of a life-saving station at Half Moon Bay, south of Point Montara and near Montara Reef, California;

S. 469. An act to restore Henry D. Hall to the Revenue-Cutter Service;

S. 1319. An act authorizing Robert A. Chapman, of Alabama, his associates and assigns, to use the waters of the Coosa River, in Alabama, for the purpose of generating electricity;

S. 462. An act to construct and place a light-ship off the outer bar of Brunswick, Ga.;

S. R. 9. Joint resolution authorizing the issue of duplicate medals where the originals have been lost or destroyed;

S. 906. An act to aid in the erection of a statue of Commodore John D. Sloat, United States Navy, at Monterey, Cal.;

S. 23. An act for the erection of a monument to the memory of John Paul Jones;

S. 131. An act to provide for the construction and equipment of a revenue cutter for service in Narragansett Bay and adjacent waters;

S. 1380. An act to provide for a site for a depot for the Revenue-Cutter Service;

S. 492. An act to amend section 2 of an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the Diocese of Washington;"

S. 711. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to fulfill certain treaty stipulations with the Chippewa Indians of Lake Superior and the Mississippi, and making appropriation for the same;

S. 1490. An act to authorize the sale of a part of what is known as the Red Lake Indian Reservation, in the State of Minnesota;

S. 708. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to authorize the building of a bridge across Thief River, in the State of Minnesota;

S. 270. An act authorizing the Winnipeg, Yankton and Gulf Railroad Company to construct a combined railroad, wagon, and foot-passenger bridge across the Missouri River at or near the city of Yankton, S. Dak.;

S. 352. An act for the relief of the representatives of M. F. Merritt, deceased;

S. 175. An act for the relief of Robert D. McAfee and John Chiatovich;

S. 177. An act to reimburse certain persons who expended moneys and furnished services and supplies in repelling invasions and suppressing Indian hostilities within the territorial limits of the present State of Nevada; and

S. 334. An act for the relief of N. F. Palmer, jr., & Co.

The message also announced that the Senate had nonconcurred in the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1760) granting a pension to Ann A. Devore, had asked for a conference with the House on the bill and amendment, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. MCCUMBER, Mr. SCOTT, and Mr. BURTON.

The message also announced that the Senate had nonconcurred in the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 200) granting an increase of pension to Austin Almy, had asked for a conference with the House on the bill and amendment, and had appointed Mr. MCCUMBER, Mr. FOSTER of Washington, and Mr. TALIAFERRO as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1334) granting a pension to Amy C. Bosworth.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I yield one hour to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL].

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], the alert, resourceful, and aggressive leader of the other side of the Chamber, has several times during this Congress characterized the devotion of the Republican party to the principles of protection as a sort of idolatry. He has been joined in this charge by other Members of the minority. His distinguished colleague, the scholarly gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], who has just submitted an able argument to the House, in the course of the carefully written speech which he delivered some days ago charged that the Republicans were still wedded to their idols. And again the gentleman from Mississippi said that those of us who regard the Dingley tariff bill as a wise and beneficent measure were fetich worshipers. Now, there is something sinister about the sound of that word "fetich." It smacks of barbarism and superstition. Let me suggest, however, to the gentleman from Mississippi that those who worship in glass temples should pull down the blinds.

But inasmuch as he and those of his political faith seem to glory in the performance of their fantastic rites with the shutters of their sanctuary wide open, they will not be surprised if we direct the attention of the country to some of their wild ceremonies. And I trust they will not be embarrassed if I ask some of them in the course of my remarks whether these weird rites conform strictly to the rubric of the Democratic missal of Jefferson, Jackson, and Cleveland.

Now, Mr. Chairman, about eight years ago the Democrats of this country, the political children of Jefferson, Jackson, and Cleveland, were carried away in captivity. By the waters of the Platte there they sat down; yea, they wept when they remembered Bryan, for he was their Nebuchadnezzar. After the captivity King Nebuchadnezzar set up a graven image 30 cubits high, and he made it of silver. It had a great white, senseless face, and it was so constructed that it could repeat with ceaseless, senseless iterations the silly words "Sixteen to one." [Laughter.] Then the edict went forth that "at what time ye shall hear the sound of the cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, and dulcimer, and all other kinds of music, ye shall fall down and worship the graven image which I have set up. And those that fall not down shall be cast into a burning, fiery furnace." [Laughter.]

You all know the cornet—that strong wind instrument. King Nebuchadnezzar himself took the cornet. And you know how the other instruments were distributed. My friend from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], whose genial face usually looks at me from his accustomed seat, certainly played the harp. With his seraphic countenance he could not play anything else than that heavenly instrument. And his colleague from Missouri on the Rules Committee [Mr. DE ARMOND], from the name of the instrument, must have played the sackbut. I never saw one, but I know it has a doleful sound.

But my friend from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], beyond all doubt, with that silver eloquence of his, performed his part on the dulcimer. And the chorus struck up. And then what happened? You all fell down and worshiped—five millions of you or more worshiped. Worshiped! You gentlemen who taunt us with idolatry worship, you simply squirmed and groveled on your marrowbones before that white, senseless idol. You wore holes in the knees of your intellectual trousers. You wore the toes off your moral boots that ought to have been used in spurning from your presence that white, senseless monstrosity of political paganism. Then when you got up you thought of the fiery furnace, and you thought with glee of the stubborn and stiff-necked ones that were going to be consumed there, and you got up off your marrowbones just long enough to gather around the burning, fiery furnace.

And lo, what happened? Well, we all know. There was Shadrach Olney, and Meshach Whitney, and Abednego Carlisle, walking around there in the burning, fiery furnace, just as cool as cucumbers [laughter], lighting their cigars on the coals and getting up a scheme to sell out the burning, fiery furnace to the steel trust. [Laughter.] And when they came out, without a singe on their hair or the smell of fire about their garments, one of the disgusted stokers of the burning, fiery furnace called out to the king, "Hey, Neb, where did you get your bum idol?" [Laughter.]

Well, then a great rock that was not made by the hand of man came out of the sky and smote that idol into unrecognizable fragments. The king told you it was a gold shot from the English navy, or some other impossible cause, but you know what it was. It was the aroused public sentiment of the intelligent people of the United States that destroyed your idol, and it ought to have put an end to your idolatry. Then you looked around for the king, and there he was, as calm as could be, amid the fragments of his idol, as complaisant as Marius in the ruins of Carthage, blowing away on his cornet to beat the band, a wild, weird air called "The First Battle." And then you gathered around and went to work picking up the fragments of the great silver idol. That took you four years.

Four years went by and King Nebuchadnezzar thought he saw his chance again and he set up another graven image, and he made this one 60 cubits high, because he used all the old silver that was in the old one, and he added to it a lot of brass and mud and slime; and running down the great brazen cheeks of the idol were the slimy tears for Aguinaldo: and this idol also was taught to say "sixteen to one," as a sort of refrain; but he was taught to say many other things. It was all worked into a monotonous chant: "Anti-imperialism, anticanned beef, sixteen to one, one Filipino is as good as sixteen American soldiers—sixteen to one, antimilitarism, antiprosperity, anticommerce, antitariff." And then the edict went forth again that "at what time ye shall hear the sound of the cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, dulcimer, and all other kinds of music, ye shall fall down and worship the graven image that I have set up; and whoso falleth not down shall be cast into the den of lions."

Well, now, there were some that were not at all afraid of the burning fiery furnace, who, when they heard the lions roar, got down on their marrow bones; but there was one who has been the Daniel of your party, Grover Cleveland. The roaring of the lions did not frighten him at all, and after you had been bowing down to this graven image quite a while you got up to see Daniel destroyed. You saw him cast into the den of lions and gathered around the mouth of the den, and behold! what do you see? There sat Daniel on a stone, just as sociable and comfortable as could be, passing his flask around to the lions and telling them fish stories. [Laughter.] The lions never touched him, and when he came out those lions just stood in two rows, between which he passed smiling. They have been afraid of him ever since; and not only the lions, but the tiger up in the State of New York has been afraid of Daniel. Now, wouldn't you think that would have put a stop to your idolatry? Well, it did for a time, and you sent Nebuchadnezzar out into the tall grass. [Laughter.]

Now, a strange thing happened. Has it ever occurred to any of you gentlemen on that side of the House what a remarkably profitable position leadership in the Democratic party is? I remember there was a local leader, Mr. Croker, up in the city of New York. I do not remember that he ever had any special business or profession. He led the Democratic party for a long time. After a while, when he got tired of it, he retired to old England and set up a fine establishment and a racing stable and began to lead the life of an English country—well, I do not care to cast any reflections upon the rural gentry of England; but he is over there, living in splendor and running his racing stable.

So, when Nebuchadnezzar was put out to grass, the first thing he did was to make his arrangements to go over to the old country.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BOUTELL. I will be glad to yield to a gentleman who contributed to the music of the ceremonies of 1896 and 1900.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does not the gentleman think that his going over there might improve the tone of English society?

Mr. BOUTELL. If the tone of English society was improved by his going over there, I should say, "God help English society." [Laughter.] Now, I have noticed this thing, that a Democratic leader militant froths and foams at the mouth whenever he refers to England or anything English, but when he becomes a Democratic leader recumbent or redundant, he finds something very attractive about old England.

Now, I have been wondering why this was. I have heard the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] affirm that all true Democrats are followers of Thomas Jefferson. He said, not very long ago, if the Democrats could nominate a man who believed all the theories of Thomas Jefferson they could make him President.

I have made some study of the theories of Thomas Jefferson myself, just to see what principles of Thomas Jefferson these Democratic leaders redundant sought to follow in hastening to old England. I ran across something which I thought explained the whole thing. In August, 1775, Thomas Jefferson wrote a letter to his intimate friend, John Randolph, in reference to the impending conflict with Great Britain, in which he used this language, which has been lost sight of.

He regretted the possibility of war because he was a man of peace, but more especially because it would prevent a reunion with Great Britain, and he said:

> I am sincerely one of those who would rather be in dependence upon Great Britain properly limited than on any other country on earth or that of any other country.

The gentleman from Mississippi will kindly correct me if I misquote.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. What date is that?

Mr. BOUTELL. August 25, 1775.

Again, I find that this distinguished founder of the Democratic party, as late as November 24, 1775, showed how thoroughly he loved union with Great Britain.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. What was that date?

Mr. BOUTELL. November 24, 1775. I did not know but what these two distinguished leaders had gone over there to get up a union between Great Britain and the United States; but, perhaps, there was still another and a more recondite or personal one. In 1771 Thomas Jefferson, in writing to his agent, Mr. Thomas Adams, in London, closes his letter with these words, which I have very seldom seen alluded to and do not know whether they are regarded by Democrats as principles that all true followers of Jefferson ought to adopt:

> One other favor. I wish you would search the Herald's office for the arms of my family.

[Laughter.]

What a picture! The founder of Democracy looking for his lost coat of arms! [Laughter.]

> I have what I have been told were the family arms, but on what authority I know not. Possibly there may be none.

Well, now, if he came from a distinguished English family who were entitled to a coat of arms, it was certainly very justifiable to look it up, if only as a matter of curiosity. We know that many distinguished men in Virginia used to decorate their coaches with coats of arms when they were entitled to them.

Mr. Chairman, that would not have been astounding, of course, if he had been animated by a desire to see the genuine coat of arms in his family. No Democrat ever would have complained in those early days of his wearing it, but still it hardly seems Jeffersonian. "It is possible there may be none. If so, I want, with your assistance, to become a purchaser, having Stern's word for it that a coat of arms may be purchased as cheap as any other coat." [Laughter.]

The gentleman from Mississippi will kindly correct me if I misquote the distinguished author of the Declaration of Independence and the founder of the Democratic party. Now, it occurred to me that this new leader of the Democracy might have some such object as this in mind in going over to England and visiting the distinguished leader from New York—that of looking up his coat of arms. If he could not find any, perhaps he might arrange with the Herald's office to buy one.

Now he has come back, and we have the statement of the public press for it that he has got a new idea. I wonder if it is his coat of arms that he bought over there? I can only surmise what it is, but there is no man perhaps better known in the wide world to-day than Mr. Bryan. The Herald's office knows his record, and they may have gotten him up some coat of arms which they would consider suited to his character. Possibly this: He beareth on a field argent a mule rampant, gules, with this motto, "Sexdecim cum uno."

Well, whatever he went over there for, he has come back. He has got an inspiration from Mr. Croker. He has got an idea, and he has brought it back, and all I wish to say to you gentlemen is, Take care, take care. You have charged us with idolatry; look out that you do not fall into any more idolatry, for you have still got William Jennings Bryan to reckon with, and I tell you that one of two things will happen to you, and it does not seem to me that it makes much difference which it is—Bryan is going to play again the successful part of Nebuchadnezzar and bring you into a new idolatry, or he is going to play the successful rôle of Samson. It makes little difference to your party whether you fall into a new idolatry or whether you have the pillars of your temple pulled down over your head. And it does not make any difference to us.

Now, when this idol worship was going on eight years ago the Chaldeans and soothsayers and astrologers went abroad through the land telling the people what was going to happen. We went into the campaign of 1896 perfectly openly. We said to the country that if we were elected we would repeal the Wilson-Gorman tariff bill.

Your soothsayers and astrologers told the people that if the Republican tariff bill was adopted and Republican financial measures were enacted terrible things would happen to this country. Some of the dire things which you predicted it is very easy to prove have not come true. You said, among other things, that with a Republican protective tariff our exports would fall off. Instead of that our exports began to increase immediately upon the passage of the present Dingley tariff act. I hold in my hand a statement from the Bureau of Statistics, showing the increase in the exports of this country during the period of some twenty years or more, which I will insert in the RECORD.

UNITED STATES LEADS IN EXPORTS

It is only within recent years that the United States has taken her place at the head of the list of the world's great exporters of domestic products. In 1875 the exports of domestic products by the world's great exporting nations were as follows:

United Kingdom	$1,097,497,000
France	747,400,000
Germany	593,052,000
United States	497,263,737

In 1885 the domestic exports of these four countries stood as follows:

United Kingdom	$1,037,124,000
Germany	680,551,000
France	596,000,000

In 1895 the domestic exports of the four countries were as follows:

United Kingdom	$1,100,452,000
United States	807,742,415
Germany	789,660,000
France	651,100,000

In 1903 the relative rank of the four countries in the exportation of domestic products was as follows:

United States	$1,457,565,783
United Kingdom	1,415,617,552
Germany [a]	1,200,000,000
France [b]	812,000,000

[a] Nine months' figures and estimate for closing quarter of the year.
[b] Eleven months' figures and estimate for last month of the year.

RECORDS OF GROWTH.

The table which follows shows the exports of domestic products from the United States, United Kingdom, and Germany in each year from 1875 to 1903, the figures being in all cases for the calendar year:

Year.	United States.	United Kingdom.	Germany.
1875	$497,263,737	$1,067,497,000	$593,052,000
1876	575,735,804	976,410,000	605,886,000
1877	607,506,495	967,913,000	656,982,000
1878	723,286,821	938,500,000	686,671,000
1879	754,656,755	932,090,000	660,352,000
1880	875,564,075	1,065,521,000	688,500,000
1881	814,162,951	1,138,873,000	707,978,000
1882	749,911,909	1,175,099,000	758,817,000
1883	777,538,718	1,166,982,000	778,257,000
1884	733,768,764	1,134,016,000	762,432,000
1885	673,593,596	1,037,124,000	680,551,000
1886	699,519,430	1,035,226,000	710,186,000
1887	703,319,682	1,079,944,000	745,896,000
1888	679,597,477	1,141,365,000	762,444,000
1889	814,154,864	1,211,442,000	753,282,000
1890	845,909,603	1,282,474,000	791,717,000
1891	957,333,551	1,203,169,000	755,771,000
1892	923,257,315	1,105,747,000	703,078,000
1893	854,729,454	1,062,162,000	735,886,000
1894	807,312,116	1,051,193,000	704,826,000
1895	807,742,415	1,100,452,000	789,660,000
1896	986,830,080	1,168,671,000	838,983,000
1897	$1,079,894,296	$1,139,832,000	$865,124,000
1898	1,233,558,140	1,135,642,000	894,063,000
1899	1,252,932,344	1,287,150,000	1,001,278,000
1900	1,453,010,112	1,417,086,000	1,097,509,000
1901	1,438,078,651	1,362,727,000	1,054,685,000
1902	1,333,288,491	1,379,282,000	1,113,312,000
1903	1,457,565,783	1,415,617,000	[a]1,200,000,000

The exports during the calendar year just closed amounted to $1,457,000,000, the record year in exports of the United States to foreign countries, nearly double the entire exports in the year 1895. But another thing that is very gratifying to us all, gentlemen, partisanship aside, gratifying to every American in this House, is that during the past few years our great Republic has changed its place from fourth in the list of exporting nations to first, and to-day we lead Great Britain, Germany, and France in our annual exports. [Applause.]

Again it was predicted that the volume of money in the country would decrease, but it has not; it is greater now than it ever was before. It was predicted that the gold in the Treasury would decrease, but it has not; we have more gold in the Treasury now than there ever was in the United States Treasury before, and we have more gold coin and bullion in the United States Treasury than was ever collected at any one spot before in the history of the world—nearly seven hundred millions of dollars. It was predicted that wages all over the country would go down, but on the contrary, from the inauguration of President McKinley up to this year just closed, the average rate of wages all over this country has gone up.

Not only the average money wage, but the actual wage as compared with the cost of subsistence.

Mr. BENNY. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield for a question?

Mr. BOUTELL. With pleasure.

Mr. BENNY. Will the gentleman tell us the rate of increase in the wages of the workingmen of the country and also the rate of increase in the cost of living to the workmen?

Mr. BOUTELL. I should be very glad, Mr. Chairman, to go into full details of that matter from figures that I have before me, but all I can say in the brief time allotted to me is that, from the statistics we have, it appears there has been a steady annual increase in the rate of wages of our workmen and mechanics, and that there has been a material decrease in the retail prices of most of the commodities of life which the workman buys with his wages.

Mr. BENNY. Perhaps, Mr. Chairman, I can put that question in better shape. Is it not a fact that the increase of wages to the workmen of the country has been less than 10 per cent, while the increase in the cost of living has been 30 per cent?

Mr. BOUTELL. It has not.

Mr. BENNY. Will the gentleman state what it has been?

Mr. BOUTELL. The average increase, taking all classes of workmen and mechanics throughout the United States, has been nearer 12 per cent. The figures that the gentleman alludes to in relation to the cost of living are simply the wholesale prices, whereas the actual cost to laboring men of the necessities of life was never so low as it is in the United States to-day.

Mr. Chairman, departing for one moment from the bounds of political discussion, let us all rejoice as Americans in the splendid record this country has made. I hold in my hand a copy of the daily consular reports containing a statement sent from one of our able consuls in Manheim, in which he goes into the rate of wages in that prosperous city of the German Empire. He shows that blacksmiths and other mechanics are getting less than one-half of the wages that men in the same employment are getting in this country, and that the cost of living to the workmen is constantly increasing in the German Empire. And so it has been with all of these predictions that were made by the Democrats in 1896; everything that was predicted by the Democrats has proven false.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. BOUTELL. Nothing would give me greater pleasure.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Will the gentleman be kind enough to state what is the difference in the annual production of gold in the last four years from what it was in 1896 to 1900?

Mr. BOUTELL. The gentleman means the increase in the annual production of gold.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. The gentleman from Illinois spoke of the increase of the per capita rate from $19 to $29.

Mr. BOUTELL. Oh, no; I didn't say that at all, although it is true. I said that the prediction was in 1896 that the amount of gold in the Treasury would fall off if the Republican tariff bill and the Republican financial measures were adopted. I said that now in the Treasury of the United States we have nearly seven hundred millions of gold against less than two hundred millions of gold in 1895.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Then, my friend does admit that the annual production of gold in the last four or five years has been enormously increased?

Mr. BOUTELL. Yes; the annual production of gold, like our productions of the farm, of the workshop, of the loom, and of the mill, is unprecedented. I do not claim that that is all due to the Republican tariff or the financial legislation of the Republican party.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I thought the gentleman did.

Mr. BOUTELL. We have a great deal to thank God for.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I thought the spirit of the gentleman's argument was that the Republican party claimed the credit of it.

Mr. BOUTELL. Not at all; I said nothing upon which such a construction could be placed. I hasten to assure my friend from Alabama that the United States is under the guidance of the God of Nations, and that He sends His early and later rains upon the just and the unjust, as he always has upon the Democrats and the Republicans alike. [Laughter.]

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BOUTELL. I yield with pleasure to the gentleman from Arkansas, as I am going to speak of his State.

Mr. MACON. The gentleman said that all the predictions made by the Democratic party in 1896 had failed or were false.

Mr. BOUTELL. No; I said every serious prediction. You made some that were so trifling and immaterial that it mattered not whether they came true or not.

Mr. MACON. Was it not predicted by the Democratic party at that time that if we had a larger circulation of metallic money, if the per capita rate was larger, that we should have prosperous times?

Mr. BOUTELL. I do not know but what it was; but the main prediction was that if we had more silver money we would have more prosperous times.

Mr. MACON. Was it not more metallic money, but not silver?

Mr. BOUTELL. I did not hear much about anything metallic except silver, I will say to my friend, throughout that campaign.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Assuming this enormous increase in gold coin, suppose in 1897 we had enacted a provision for coining silver at a ratio of 16 to 1, in the opinion of the gentleman how much of the increase of gold coin would have found its way into circulation in the United States?

Mr. BOUTELL. Very little, and not one dollar into the Treasury of the United States. Speaking of that subject, I am very glad that the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MACON] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] remind me of it. I hold in my hand an editorial from the Chicago Chronicle, one of the ablest Democratic newspapers published in this country, under date of September 10, 1902, entitled "Gold in the Treasury." The sum and substance of this editorial is that the reason why there is more gold in the Treasury, not only Government gold but the people's gold, put there in exchange for gold certificates, is that the people of the country now have confidence in the financial system that we have adopted and are willing to let their gold stay there. [Applause on the Republican side.]

But, Mr. Chairman, these few remarks I have been making were merely on the side, as will be seen when I go further into my argument. I did not expect at this time to get into a general discussion, a general run of questions. I desired to call the attention of the House and of the country to this fact, that most of the prophecies, the serious prophecies, of the Democratic party relating to what would take place if the Republicans triumphed in 1896 and in 1900 have proven false, and all these predictions which can be gauged by official statistics have been so proven. But they also said, Mr. Chairman, in general terms, that if the Republicans triumphed and enacted a protective tariff law and financial legislation in keeping with the principles of the Republican party we would bring distress and disaster, blight and mildew upon the country. Mr. Chairman, it is to these predictions that I wish to address myself during the remainder of my remarks.

Seven years have elapsed since the Dingley tariff law was placed upon the statute books. They have been, in my opinion, seven good, fat years for this Republic. In my part of the country I could not find any blight or mildew, and I thought that if any existed I would like to see it, and it occurred to me that if that blight and mildew existed anywhere it would be in the State of Missouri and in the solid South, because it was in that State and in the solid South that the blight and mildew were most strongly predicted. I was at a loss to know how to make a trustworthy examination. I thought if I went through all the Southern States myself and came back here and reported what I found there that it might be thought my views were tinged in some way by my political sentiments.

I did not wish to take the opinion of any mere Government statistics. I thought that it might be charged that those were incorrect. I did not wish to take any trade reports exclusively, except in connection with other reports, because I have heard it charged that these trade reports are sometimes tinged or colored. I did not wish to take the statement of any active politician. I did not wish to take the statement of newpapers in the heat of a campaign, and so I was at a loss to know where I could find an account of the spots of blight and mildew throughout this country. Then this idea occurred to me, that if there was anything honest in this world it was the newspapers.

I have had the word of my distinguished friend from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] on several occasions in this House that he would rather have a country without almost anything than without newspapers, the great educators of the people. So I said to myself, "I will go to the newspapers and find out what has been going on where this blight and mildew ought to be." I was afraid that papers issued during a campaign might be prejudiced. So it occurred to me that if I should hunt up the local papers—taking the metropolitan journals where necessary, and the little village and country papers, the weekly and biweekly newspapers that were published about the holiday time, that season of peace on earth and good will toward men—I would find the actual truth. So for the last three weeks I have been looking over the papers from the State of Missouri and from the solid South, and I must say to you, gentlemen, that I have been surprised at the condition of affairs disclosed by these local papers. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] in his speech in the House on the 19th said:

> Protection, Mr. Chairman, is a system of taxation whereby many are robbed in order that a few men may be hothoused by legislation into artificial prosperity.

And the RECORD goes on to say that that statement was received with laughter and applause on the Democratic side. I may say that I was not at all surprised at the laughter, but I was surprised at the applause. He goes on further to say:

> As a supplementary definition, protection is a system of taxation whereby capital and labor are deflected from naturally profitable pursuits and enterprises into the channels of naturally unprofitable pursuits and enterprises.

This again was met with laughter and applause on the Democratic side of the House, and again I say I do not wonder at the laughter. Before I go on to give the story of the condition of things throughout the South, let me impress upon your minds these words of the gentleman from Mississippi:

> Protection is a system of taxation whereby capital and labor are deflected from natural profitable pursuits and enterprises into the channels of naturally unprofitable pursuits and enterprises.

Now, let us see if we can find any blight and mildew where we should expect to find it from the utterances of gentlemen on the other side. And I begin with the State of Missouri, for several reasons—partly because I have very tender recollections of the State of Missouri. I do not see here now my friend from Missouri, Mr. COWHERD, with whose district I will begin here. But during the closing year of the war, as a boy of 8, I spent one of the most picturesque years of my life in the district of that gentleman.

Mr. CLARK. You were a very old boy.

Mr. BOUTELL. I have given my age, and you see you are an older boy than I am.

The Kansas City Journal of January 1 says:

> According to statements made by officials of the railroads running into Kansas City, every company has reason to rejoice over the business for the year just closed. One general agent said that the earnings of his road had increased 38½ per cent over 1902.

That was bringing the cattle and the products of the farm.

The Star, in an editorial of January 1, says:

> Bank clearings are not always a definite indication of business movements, but they may be taken as a reliable basis of comparison in noting progress in any one city. The clearings in Kansas City for the past year were one thousand and seventy-five millions, or an increase of eighty-six millions (9 per cent) over the record of 1902. Building records and real estate transfers show similar increase. Both the wholesale and retail merchants report gains.

I congratulate the State of Missouri and my colleague [Mr. COWHERD] upon this showing.

I next refer to the St. Joseph Gazette of January 1. I do not see here at present the gentleman who represents St. Joseph—and I think this is the first time that I have ever missed him from this House; he is one of the most regular attendants here. He played a very loud instrument in the ceremonies of 1896, but the principal thing that he claimed when he performed on his musical instrument was that never, never, under any Republican financial legislation, would there be enough basic money or any other kind of money in the country to do the business required.

I do not know what the gentleman's connection with the St. Joseph Gazette is at present.

[Mr. COCHRAN at this point entered the Hall.]

Mr. BOUTELL. Ah, I congratulate myself on seeing the gentleman before me. The St. Joseph Gazette of January 1 says:

The country upon which St. Joseph depends for its maintenance is prosperous to a most gratifying degree. Crops have been fairly abundant; prices for the products of the farm and range far in excess of the average for many years.

Now, mark this—what gall and wormwood it must be to the gentleman from St. Joseph——

Mr. COCHRAN. Will the gentleman yield a moment?

Mr. BOUTELL. Of course. I always yield with great pleasure to the gentleman.

Mr. COCHRAN. With almost tearful gratitude, I rise to announce to the gentleman that among other acquisitions of the great syndicate which embraces so many of the daily papers of the country the St. Joseph Gazette is now owned by the followers of MARK HANNA and my friend from Illinois. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BOUTELL. I congratulate my friend from St. Joseph on having such prosperity in his district, that he was able to dispose of the St. Joseph Gazette at such a good price.

Mr. COCHRAN rose.

Mr. BOUTELL. The gentleman from Missouri when I am through will have an opportunity to deny the truth of these statements as to the prosperity in his district. And I may say now, Mr. Chairman, that as I read this story of the condition of the South I will ask any gentleman on the other side of this Chamber, if he cares to do so, to get up and deny the truth of this story that I read, and if he likes to go back to his constituents and tell them that he has made the denial.

Now, let me close what I was saying about St. Joseph.

Money we have in sufficient quantities to meet the reasonable requirements of every line of legitimate investment and for every department of trade.

The St. Louis Globe-Democrat, in an editorial of January 1, says:

Fortune was kind to St. Louis in the year which has just closed.

And I congratulate St. Louis. We have in Chicago a sisterly regard for her. We have just been connecting the two cities by water, and I hope there will be a steadily increasing trade and commerce between those two cities on this great waterway.

Seldom in all its history has the city been more prosperous. Never before has the aggregate of its great business activities been so large.

Mark that.

December, 1903, broke the record for that month in bank clearings in St. Louis, with a total of $234,063,008. This was $24,945,152 in excess of that for the same month in 1902. In receipts of flour, corn, oats, rye, barley, corn meal, hay, lead, cattle, sheep, hogs, horses, and mules the city's transactions for 1903 were greater than for the preceding year, while there was a falling off in receipts for wheat, cotton, tobacco, wool, pork, hams, and other sorts of meats. In building operations the record for this city was broken in the year.

Mr. Chairman, I congratulate St. Louis and the State of Missouri.

Now, we come across the country to the Old Dominion. First, I read from the Newport News Press, of January 1, in a news article, which says:

The merchants say that business this Christmas was better than it had been in four years. The police census, taken recently, showed that there were fewer vacant houses than there were a year ago; real-estate values are firm and rents are cheap. A better statement of affairs could hardly be asked for.

Then why, may I ask, does their Representative here ask for a change? Why not let well enough alone?

The clearing-house statement follows:

Now we come to Norfolk. The Despatch in an editorial of January 1 says:

The cities of tide-water Virginia have experienced a solid and increasing growth during the past ten years. Norfolk is in many, many ways better off to-day than a year ago. Churches, schools, charitable organizations, and business organizations have flourished and grown and improved within the year. Local bank deposits have shown a steady increase during the year, and local bank clearings also indicate an increase in the volume of business done in the city, and the record of the year past is the largest in the history of the city.

I congratulate the Old Dominion.

The Landmark in a news article of January 1 says:

The exports were $9,375,282 in 1903, an increase of $2,256,039 during the year, showing that the year has been a prosperous one in the shipping trade.

The Petersburg Index-Appeal, of January 1, in a news article, says:

In taking a view of the business progress of our city in 1903, as it relates to previous years, we are pleased to note that our people have been very conservative and the speculative rage has not impaired nor retarded the advance in regular business. In all regular pursuits the close is very satisfactory, advances having been made all along the line. The good crops of our contiguous counties, with unusually remunerative prices places, our agricultural neighbors in a very prosperous condition.

The Richmond Times-Despatch of January 1 says:

Merchants have had good trade, manufacturing industries have done well, and it is most gratifying that in spite of the stock panic and the shrinkage in the value of stocks and bonds the banks of Richmond have stood the storm without a quiver and are to-day in every respect stronger and better than in any corresponding period of their history.

I congratulate the city of Richmond on this splendid showing.

Florida: The Jacksonville Times-Union of January 1 says in a news article:

The record of shipping at the port of Jacksonville for the month of December was one of the best in the history of the port, and was a closing of one of the most remarkable years yet recorded in the annals of the city's export business. More than 2,000,000 feet of lumber were shipped from the port during December, 1903, in excess of the amount shipped for the corresponding month last year. Lumber is the basis upon which to compute the volume of the export trade, and this increase in spite of the fact that there has been a depression of values complained of by prominent lumbermen for the past several months.

The Metropolis of January 1 says:

The old year was extremely kind to Jacksonville. She has prospered unprecedentedly. There has not been a failure of a business house or individual of much financial standing during the past year. Millions of dollars more money are here in banks than ever before.

And let me say, Mr. Chairman, that you will notice through all these accounts that it has taxed the ingenuity of the editor to find adjectives large enough and broad enough to characterize the prosperous condition of the country.

The Pensacola News of January 1 says:

With the closing of the year 1903 the record of the local custom-house shows that the month of December has been one of the best on record. The total values, so far as can now be obtained, will aggregate the immense sum of $3,148,059. The nearest approach to these figures was the same month last year, when the two-million mark was just passed.

The St. Petersburg Times of January 2 says in an editorial:

St. Petersburg has had a bright year, and an even brighter is before her. There is a no more prosperous spot in the Union.

I looked over the House for my good friend from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN], in whose district this prosperous enterprising city is located. I congratulate him and his district. I come to Kentucky.

Lexington: The Leader on January 1 printed the views of the leading business men of the city on the achievements of 1903 and the outlook for 1904. In all branches of business the merchants claim that a prosperous year has passed and all take an optimistic view for the coming year.

Not some few Republicans in Lexington, but all the people in Lexington, unless it be her Representative up here, take an optimistic view of the future.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman from Illinois permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BOUTELL. I am very glad indeed to yield to the gentleman who played on the musical instruments during the campaigns of 1896 and 1900. I do not know whether my friend played the psaltery or the base drum, but I am quite willing to yield to him for a few strains on either, although I may say I am coming to Tennessee further on.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I believed so. I know that all good men want to come down to Tennessee. [Laughter.] We have a great many from your country.

Mr. BOUTELL. Yes; they are going, and they are taking good money with them.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now you complain——

Mr. BOUTELL. And not all Democrats——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If you will come down there we will elect you mayor of the city of Nashville in two years. You would be a shouting Democrat in Tennessee. [Laughter.] You speak of Kentucky. I live very near to Kentucky, and I know the condition of the people in that country as to tobacco growers.

Mr. BOUTELL. The gentleman does not seem to understand that I am reading from the local papers.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. My mail is filled with letters complaining to me and to the Members of Congress about the terribly destructive internal-revenue regulations upon the tobacco-growing industry of that country, and the tobacco growers are now meeting all over Kentucky and Tennessee and are talking to-day about preparing a petition to Congress for a reduction of the tobacco tax, which is so destructive of their tobacco-growing industry. This tax began in 1862 and has been perpetuated to this hour. They want relief from it.

Mr. BOUTELL. I am glad that the gentleman from Tennessee has called attention to this desire on the part of the people of the State adjoining his. This paper shows him that those people of Kentucky, who, no doubt, will thank my good friend for his patriotism in rising in this House and making an iridescent appeal for the repeal of this obnoxious tax, do not complain of anything.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Sometimes people think that everything is true when they see it in a newspaper report, and it would be true if Thomas Jefferson edited it.

Mr. BOUTELL. Thomas Jefferson was not in the editing business. The Louisville Herald, in a news article, on January 1, says——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, that is a Republican paper.

Mr. BOUTELL (continuing to read):

High-water mark was reached by the bank clearings of 1903, with the handsome total of $529,241,195.13, an increase of $27,817,085 over the year 1902, the previous record period.

The gentleman from Tennessee indicated that this was a Republican paper. That is entirely irrelevant. As a lawyer he knows that it is a non sequitur. Do you wish to get up and dispute the figuers of $529,000,000 of bank clearings?

The Louisville Times in a five-page review of the year in the business of the city shows a large advance in all lines over previous years.

Now I come to the State of Georgia. First to the district represented by the gentleman who has charge of this bill on the minority side. The Atlanta Journal, in news article on January 1, gives city comptroller's report, showing receipts for 1903 of $2,036,548.32, with a surplus of $1,720.29 after provision has been made to meet all outstanding obligations. For 1902 the receipts were $1,632,703.63. This statement shows the condition of all departments of the city government, and as such is therefore an index of the prosperity of the city.

The Atlanta Constitution, in a news article of January 1, says:

Annual reports of all city officials show a bright chapter in the history of Atlanta, the year 1903 having been one of the most prosperous in its history.

In the same paper an article on the report of the Atlanta clearing house says:

The clearings of 1902 were increased by $13,791,580.34. The year's record is a remarkable one, and is considered as a strong indication of the substantiability and growth of business in Atlanta.

The Augusta Chronicle, in an editorial of January 1, says:

Augusta enters the new year with every cause for encouragement. In the first place, her merchants, both wholesale and retail, wind up the old year with one of the best business records in their history. Their fall trade has been especially good, and while money has not been altogether plentiful, there has been enough to go around.

The high price of cotton has added thousands of dollars to the last year's income of tens of thousands of people throughout Augusta's territory. Throughout the country contiguous to Augusta the people are more than ordinarily prosperous and more than ordinarily hopeful for the future.

We know that Georgia people are always hopeful, and we are glad that now they are prosperous.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. BOUTELL. Certainly, with pleasure.

Mr. COCHRAN. That by most people is attributed to the boll weevil. Do you call that a Republican institution or not? [Laughter.]

Mr. BOUTELL. If I was going to reply truthfully to the gentleman who played the trombone in the ceremonies in 1896, I should say that was an entirely irrelevant remark. Whether the boll weevil was sent by Providence or was something originated by the Democratic party, I want to say to him that it was the Republican party in this House that without a division or an objecting voice or a roll call, in defiance of the principles of your party, generously appropriated everything that was asked for to extinguish the boll weevil, wherever it came from. [Applause.]

Mr. COCHRAN. I would like to ask a further question.

Mr. BOUTELL. Certainly.

Mr. COCHRAN. Do you think your constituents will be delighted when they find that you answer my question in that way?

Mr. BOUTELL. I think they will be very much delighted, but I will be glad to take you out there and introduce you to them and let them tell you.

Mr. COCHRAN. I think the gentleman might have answered whether the boll weevil was a Republican concern or not. I want to know whether the Republican party is responsible for the boll weevil; whether the gentleman is responsible for it I do not know.

Mr. BOUTELL. I will pass on. We now come to Macon. Mr. Chairman, perhaps I ought to pause here in coming to the country of my good friend from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT], for whom I have as high a respect as any man in the House, and great fondness, and say that it was disclosed in reading the report on this bill a few minutes ago that there was nothing the matter with the prosperity in Macon. The gentleman in charge of this bill called attention to the fact that down there in Macon they have prosperity so broad and deep that they are able to build a livery stable good enough for the United States post-office. I congratulate the gentleman on that condition of things down there.

Mr. BARTLETT. Oh, no.

Mr. BOUTELL. Does the gentleman deny they build good stables in Macon?

Mr. BARTLETT. No; they build such good ones that they are good enough for a Government post-office with a little addition.

Mr. BOUTELL. And the Republican party will give all the additions you want for the purpose.

Mr. BARTLETT. Much obliged.

Mr. BOUTELL. The Macon News of January 1 says:

Builders and architects declare that the past year was a splendid one in the building era of Macon. Buildings have been erected in 1903 worth $500,000, while many of these buildings were such as the Mercer University, costing some $30,000, and St. Paul's Church, costing $20,000.

I congratulate the gentleman from Georgia, not only on the prosperity of his district, but on the character of the buildings which this prosperity enabled him to build.

It is also noticeable that those owned by the working classes—

And I call the special attention of my friends on the other side of the Chamber to this—

It is also noticeable that those owned by the working classes and constructed with the savings of those workers form no small part of the number noted in the building inspector's report for the year.

I congratulate the gentleman from Georgia that these workingmen in his State are so prosperous. In the same paper, under an editorial, it says:

The new year finds Macon all right.

Of course it is——

Mr. BARTLETT. And always has been that way.

Mr. BOUTELL (reading)—

The city is progressing and our business concerns prospering and our industrial institutions are flourishing, and the year just closed has seen her limits extended, her population increased, her property has increased in value, and her trade has enlarged.

How could you get anything better than that?

In a news article of the Savannah News, it says:

Savannah established a new record during the year ending last night.

I am glad to see the gentleman from Savannah here taking in all this good news about his district.

The foreign exports from this port for 1903 were over $9,000,000 greater than those for any previous year in the history and nearly 100 per cent greater than they were for the year 1890, which was one of the best years prior to the last four years.

Savannah's record last year shows that the confidence felt by its citizens in its future is not misplaced, and there will in all probability be a steady expansion in its business relations with the world outside of the United States.

In another news article of the same date the News says:

Business men of Savannah predict great things for the coming year.

Of course they are; they are entitled to it as long as the Republican party remains in power.

Past conditions have been good; advanced prices in cotton has helped all lines of business. Bankers, brokers, and business men generally are jubilant over future prospects. The banks have plenty of money to loan, despite the present fluctuations in the cotton market.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BOUTELL. With pleasure.

Mr. POU. I want to ask the gentleman if he claims sincerely that the Republican party is in any measure at all responsible for the present high price of cotton? Does the gentleman claim that his party is entitled to the credit of the price of cotton, which is now selling at 15 cents a pound?

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Chairman, I am afraid the gentleman from North Carolina misconstrues the trend of my remarks, and has confused what is said in these good Democratic journals with what I have said. I have made no claim at all of any such preposterous nature, and if the gentleman will kindly wait until I am through I should be very glad to yield to any questions that he may ask. I am making no claim as yet for what the Republican party has done or for what the Republican party has not done. I am reading from the local papers of thirteen States what the editors of those papers have to say in regard to the condition of things in their localities, and any claim that I have to make I will make when I have finished reading, and if the gentleman will kindly allow me to proceed, I will then yield to him.

I now come to North Carolina. The Rural News and Observer, in an editorial of January 1, says:

The year that closed last night has been a good one for North Carolina and the American Republic. Crops have been large and prices good. It has been a specially good year for farmers.

And this applies somewhat to what the gentleman says.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, might I ask the gentleman one more question? I admit that, so far as my section is concerned, we are enjoying unusual prosperity. That prosperity is brought about largely from two causes—the high price of cotton, which is the principal cause. Now, I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois if he claims that the Republican party is entitled in any degree to the credit of the present high price of cotton?

Mr. BOUTELL. The Republican party has nothing to do with the current price of cotton, specifically, any more than it has to do with the current price of any other article; but when the springs of prosperity are pure and at full pressure they will reach a high level all over the country.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. In that immediate connection will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Chairman, I have asked permission to continue the story of the condition of things in the Southern States, and after that is over I shall be very glad to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois declines to yield.

Mr. BOUTELL (continuing the reading):

It has been a specially good year for farmers. There can be no widespread prosperity that does not reach the farm. When good times bless the rural homes there is improvement in every line of business and stability in the nation's financial condition, for it is the amount paid for farm exports that determines the balance of trade. High-priced cotton has not only blessed every avenue of trade in the South, but has blessed every section of the country. Cotton growing and cotton manufacturing mean much for North Carolina. The State depends chiefly upon the cotton farm and the cotton mill.

I am glad to call attention to the fact that the time has come now when, under the invigorating influence of Republican protection, the cotton manufacturing becomes profitable to the Southern States.

The Wilmington Morning Star, in a news article on January 1, says:

The steady increase in the commerce of Wilmington is extremely gratifying to the people of the city, and the growing importance of the chief seaport of North Carolina will alike be a source of gratification to the people of the entire State.

During the year 1903 the exports of Wilmington were more than $20,000,000.

Now I come to South Carolina, and I quote from the Charleston News and Courier, in a news article of January 1, which says:

The banks of Columbia show by their reports that they have had a very successful year, and it follows that the people of the city have cause to be, in a large measure, satisfied with the last year's business. The total deposits in the five banks amount to $3,503,907.50, a very large sum for a city of the population of Columbia. Compared with former years the deposits increased very much, and the bankers seem to be full of confidence of still greater proportionate increase during the present year.

The Greenville News of January 1, in a news article, says:

The year 1903 has been one of unprecedented growth and general improvement. Something like $2,000,000 has been expended during the year in the erection of public and private buildings, manufacturing plants, and various other commercial enterprises. The most successful year in the history of Greenville has passed. Nineteen hundred and three has left the city greater, richer, and more prosperous than when it came.

We now come to the State of Tennessee. The Chattanooga Times, in a news article of January 1, says:

The balance, after deducting all expenses of the city, is much larger than a year ago. The reports show that fifty-five more permits for buildings and improvements were issued during 1903 than 1902, which was the banner year prior to 1903. These buildings and improvements were to cost $640,000, as against $556,000 in the previous year. The bank clearings of 1903 show an increase of $10,000,000 over the preceding year, the total clearing for this year in Chattanooga being $37,000,000. This is one of the best reports ever given out by the local clearing house and proves the condition of business in the city to be very healthy.

The Knoxville Journal and Tribune, in a news article, says:

According to the annual clearing-house reports, an enormous increase of 43 per cent is shown in 1903 over the preceding year. The clearings were fifty-eight millions as compared with forty millions, or an increase of $17,000,000 in this city of Nashville. The building permits for the year were nearly double those of 1902.

Now we come to Memphis, and I ask the committee to pay especial attention to this. The Commercial Appeal, on January 1, in a news article, says:

For the year past the total clearings of Memphis were $214,000,000. This figure is one that taxes the mind to comprehend.

I congratulate the district in which is situated the city of Memphis on its having a Representative on the floor of this House who can entirely comprehend these figures. The article goes on to say:

They show an excess over 1902 of about $35,000,000, a monthly increase of nearly $3,000,000.

The Scimitar of January 1, in an editorial, says:

Memphis starts the new year with as bright prospects as any city in the country. The records made in the various branches of industry in 1903 far surpass anything ever known here, and there is nothing on the horizon to indicate that the present prosperity will soon be eclipsed.

Evidently in the mind of the editor of the Scimitar the Democratic party is not on the horizon. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

The Nashville Banner of January 2 says:

The increase of the Nashville bank clearings for 1903 over those of the previous year carry unmistakable proof of the business advancement of this city. The Nashville clearings show an increase of $33,000,000, which is about 35 per cent, the total clearings for the year being $124,000,000.

We now come to Alabama. The Birmingham News of January 2, under an article taken from the Manufacturers' Record, of Baltimore, says:

Leading railroad officials of the South and Southwest tell a story of progress and prosperity such as could never before have been presented from that section.

Listen to this—those who think that all the prosperity in the South comes from cotton:

Agriculturists, fruit growers, stock raisers, wood workers, timber operators, are coming into the South from all sections of the older and more settled States, and the development of every line of husbandry and industry is proceeding at a rate never before equaled in the South.

In a dispatch from Bessemer—does it not seem strange that if any town in the South is controlled by a Democratic population they would be willing to name a town Bessemer without repealing the duty on steel—in the Birmingham World and Herald of January 1, we find the following:

The year that goes out to-night has been especially prosperous for this city. The merchants will report an exceedingly healthy business, and are looking for additional success during the coming year. The numerous new buildings which have been erected during the past twelve months bespeak the confidence placed in the prospects of the city of Bessemer. The banks are in a flourishing condition and enjoy the patronage of an immense number of citizens.

Here we have a dispatch from Selma, and I look about for the friendly and genial countenance of my friend Mr. BOWIE——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I agree with the gentleman in all that he says about all these things, excepting that he does not tell enough.

Mr. BOUTELL. I am telling all that I can within my hour, and my time has been extended already.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Everything the gentleman has said about Birmingham is a fact, but it is also true that within the past twelve months there were 60,000,000 tons of coal taken out by the South, and that Birmingham itself took out more than one-quarter, or 20,000,000 tons more than was taken out in the United States in 1880.

Mr. BOUTELL. So it is all over the South. It is the same grand story that comes to us. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I would like to remind the gentleman——

Mr. BOUTELL. I am coming to Mississippi presently.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I know; but I would like to remind the gentleman that that coal was taken out in the only year of free coal that we have had in a long time. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BOUTELL. If the gentleman really thinks that that makes any difference or that there is any politics in this matter, I can only recall—probably he will recall it, though it may seem a non sequitur—that the first tariff item placed in the bill of 1789, by a Virginian, was to tax coal, and in the Chamber of the House of Representatives he said, in pressing that item:

If we can put a restraint on the importation of coal, Virginia can furnish enough for all the United States.

That is where the first tax on coal came.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now, if the gentleman will permit me a moment, he evidently misunderstood the application of my remark. It was designed simply to prove that neither the Republican party nor the Republican party's protective policy had anything to do with taking out that great amount of coal.

Mr. BOUTELL. And that the Democratic party and Democratic policy had still less to do with it, if that were possible.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Well, the removal of the tariff on that article did not hurt anybody.

Mr. BOUTELL. A Selma correspondent of the Montgomery Advertiser of January 2 sends an interesting dispatch, and in reading it I look around for my genial friend Mr. BOWIE:

The past year has been a memorable one in Selma in way of material advancement, as the following partial list of some of the visible improvements will show:

Louisville and Nashville Railroad bridge (completed)	$200,000
Louisville and Nashville passenger station (completed)	25,000
First Baptist Church	42,000
City building	25,000
Elks' Home	21,000

Every Elk will appreciate that.

Public building (authorized)	75,000
M. W. Walker's stores and warehouses	15,000
C. W. Hooper & Co.'s modern store	30,000
W. R. Peacock's residence	7,000
Jud Brislin's residence	5,000
Twenty-five cottages (average cost $2,000)	150,000

"Twenty-five cottages!" That is what I like to hear about—these cottages going up in the South; that is the sort of prosperity that I like to hear of from every part of the country, and especially from the South.

Now we come to Arkansas. The Arkansas Democrat, of Little Rock, in an editorial of January 1, says—and I will say that anybody may stop me to say whether these papers that I am quoting from are Republican papers or not; this one is called the "Democrat:"

Little Rock has made rapid strides during the past year, adding many substantial improvements to her material development.

The Gazette of January 1, in a news article, says:

The reports of the board of trade for 1903 show the business of the city to be in a very prosperous condition. The decrease in the cotton crop is overcome by the increase in value, as is shown by the bank clearings. The bank clearings for 1903 were $52,288,174.78; for 1902, $48,521,981.99, showing an increase of $3,766,192.79, or 8 per cent.

The Gazette of January 2, in an interview with George R. Brown, secretary of the board of trade, says:

My opinion is that the past year has been the most prosperous in the history of Little Rock. By prosperous I mean that all classes of our people have done well; the laborer has had steady employment at a good wage; the merchants have had good trade; manufacturers have had more than they could do, and investors have reaped a rich harvest wherever their capital has been invested.

That is glorious news from Arkansas. We now come to Texas.

The Galveston News of January 1, 1904, publishes an article containing these statements:

Business over the wharves of Galveston during the past year was $528,602,561, as against $347,993,163 in 1902.

The growth of the port is satisfactory and all that could be desired.

Suffice it to say, the record of the past year is grand enough even in the estimation of the most sordid pessimist to inspire confidence in a glorious future.

During the year the port advanced from fourth to third place in its rank amongst exporting ports in the United States. Both the wholesale and retail trade in Galveston during the past year has been satisfactory.

The bank buildings were valued $439,832,000, as against $389,104,000.

The custom-house receipts were $415,120, as against $313,804 in 1902.

The foreign export values reached the enormous sum of $143,168,564, as against $92,756,044 in 1902.

A part of the increase is due to the high price of cotton and to the heavy movement of the staple during October, November, and December; but a portion of the increased business is due to the more general use of this port by the immense territory tributary to it.

The imports during the last year were $1,377,328, as against $1,312,319 in 1902.

In 1903 the Federal Government spent at the port of Galveston $427,273. The fund available for expenditure at the port for the year 1904 is $1,059,510. During the past year 2,007 immigrants landed in Galveston, as against 1,461 in 1902.

I congratulate the Representative from that district [Mr. GREGG] on the splendid showing that Galveston has made among the great exporting and importing cities of the country.

The Austin Statesman of January 1, in an editorial, says:

In a business way Austin is largely indebted to the past year. Its business men can record a success that is a large improvement on former years. All departments of business have experienced this improvement. In the matter of erection of new buildings Austin in the last year has added greatly to the comfort and convenience of its people. Perhaps no city in the State has added within it and on its environs more architecturally handsome residences than Austin, and at the close of the year there is nothing to discourage, but much to animate to renewed activity in all departments, whether of public or private utility.

I certainly congratulate my good friend from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] on this magnificent showing in his district. And so it is all through the State of Texas.

The El Paso Herald, in an editorial of January 1, says:

Business in all lines has prospered during 1903. With a few comparatively unimportant exceptions there have been no business failures, and the general standing of business enterprises to-day is far better than it was a year ago.

The Fort Worth Record of January 1, in a news article, says:

From a financial standpoint 1903 was the best year that has ever passed over Fort Worth. The condition of the banks reflects the condition of the people. The clearings during the year were $108,907,238.36, an increase of $20,833,718.74 over the clearings of 1902.

The Galveston News of January 1, in a news article, says:

At the port of Galveston the year 1903 has been wonderful in many ways. The records of the previous years were not broken by a mere scratch, but so far surpassed that old values appear insignificant in comparison. Foreign exports were $143,168,564. For 1902 they were $92,756,044, an increase of $50,412,520. Bank clearings for 1903 were $439,832,000, as against $389,104,000 for 1902, a gain of $50,728,000.

The Galveston Tribune, in an editorial on January 1, says:

Texas, throughout its length and breadth, never enjoyed greater general prosperity than during 1903. Galveston has finished 1903 in splendid shape. More records have been broken in the business done through the port and in the transactions of corporations, firms, and individuals doing business here than ever before in a single year.

The Post, of Houston, Tex., in a news article of January 1, says:

No better barometer of trade can be found in the city than the statistics of the clearing house. The clearings for the year were $896,928,866, as against $802,931,516 in 1902, an increase of $93,997,350. The figures tell the story of Houston in the twelve months just ended, and indicate that the time has been a prosperous one.

Mr. Chairman, I do not wonder that our good friend, Representative Ball, wanted to get back to his district. We are sorry to lose him, but with such prosperity reigning there no one could blame him for wanting to be on the ground. But we extend a cordial grasp of welcome to his successor and congratulate him on the district that he comes from.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, let me ask my friend in this connection if that is not the State that has been suffering from the ravages of the boll weevil?

Mr. BOUTELL. It is; but I have no reflections to make on that. This story must be told in the words of the southern papers themselves, and if the gentleman will kindly let me finish this story I shall be obliged.

The San Antonio Express of January 1 says:

The year that has just been closed has been a remarkable one in the business history of San Antonio.

And I look about for my friend from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] to dispute it or deny it if he cares to.

It was a year of magnificent prospects, which were reflected in the large real-estate transactions in the spring months. It was also a year of heavy crops, not only for the county, but for the trade territory of San Antonio, the healthy condition of the rural districts being reflected in a holiday trade that broke the record for many years.

Now we come to the good old creole State. First we have the Baton Rouge Advocate of January 1, and I look for my colleague on the Ways and Means Committee [Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana]:

Yesterday marked the close of a most prosperous year in the history of Baton Rouge. Good crops and splendid prices brought worlds of money to our people, and all, black and white, have done exceedingly well. A new railroad opens up a new section of country to us and it will aid materially in our prosperity. Public finances—city and parish—are in fine condition, new enterprises are being installed, and the volume of trade and business continues to multiply and improve.

Is not that a grand statement from this community?

Here we have from New Orleans an editorial in a paper called the Item, on January 1, a paragraph of which says:

The year 1903 closes at New Orleans with a magnificent business showing, as evidenced by our bank clearings, which is an accurate index of the growth or decline of business. Clearances for 1903, $927,710,850; for 1902, $672,360,577.

The Picayune, in an editorial on January 1, says:

Probably never in the history of this city has there been a more prosperous period than that encompassed in the twelve months known as 1903. Of course the enhanced value of cotton has helped the clearings not a little, particularly during the last three months of the year, but that fact is not responsible for the principal portion of the gain. The South as a whole has been prosperous as it has never been before, and that fact has very naturally and properly reacted favorably upon the South's largest city and financial center. During the year New Orleans not only has held her own as a great cotton market, but she has wrested from New York the supremacy as the leading speculative cotton market.

I congratulate my friends [Mr. MEYER of Louisiana and Mr. DAVEY] on the triumphs of the financiers of New Orleans over those of Wall street. [Applause.]

The Times-Democrat, in an editorial of January 1, says:

From no part of the Union will the words "A happy New Year" come more appropriately to-day than in the South. Cotton, for instance, although a small crop, has returned the southern farmers several hundred million dollars more than the biggest crop ever raised. Cotton, however, is only one of the incidents of southern prosperity for the year. The lumber business was phenomenally large, and so, indeed, were the manufactures of all kinds. The South led the Union in its construction of new railroad trackage and in the increase in the amount of business its railroads handled.

And let me say of the Times-Democrat, for fear that it might be colored by any friendly feeling toward the present Administration, that some of the adjoining editorials would seem to indicate very plainly that it was still in the solid column of Democratic newspapers. It says:

Yesterday New Orleans closed its books on the best year the city has ever had in business. For the year 1902 over 1901 there was an improvement on the clearings of $68,809,453, or 11.4 per cent, and we thought that very satisfactory and something to boast of, but 1903 shows an advance of $255,350,273, or 38.1 per cent.

I call attention to this, and if any paper in the South can speak for all that country it is this journal.

Well might this paper give to the country a happy New Year on the part of the South.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman allow me a minute?

Mr. BOUTELL. I asked that I might be permitted to conclude this story that is made up with scissors and a paste pot.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. All right.

Mr. BOUTELL. We now come to the State of Mississippi.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I yield the gentleman thirty minutes more time.

Mr. BOUTELL. I did not realize that this story was so good or so long or would be so interesting.

The Natchez Democrat, in an editorial of January 1, said:

A review of the past year in a business sense is hardly necessary at this time, as it is a fact well known that as a whole the year was filled with good trade. Cotton, which is our chief reliance, developed an unusual strength and began a march which almost brought it up to the highest price on record. New industries have been added to industrial circles, which is beneficial to all lines of the commercial world. There has been a substantial increase in railroad building. The building world of Natchez enjoyed a most healthful boom, and it will be continued through this year.

I hope that it will, and for very many years to come; and I am glad to know that the boom has struck Mississippi. [Applause on the Republican side.]

In looking over the little local papers to find out, if I could, the most trustworthy statements from the rural homes and the quiet retired spots, I ran upon the Weekly Clarion and Ledger, of Jackson, Miss., of January 7, 1904. I found that this little paper contained what purported to be the full text of the annual message of the governor of Mississippi to the legislature. I think Governor Longino had completed his four years' service, and delivered this as a valedictory address before Governor Vardamann had come in and delivered his salutatory. I felt certain that a man who had been governor of Mississippi for four years was better entitled than anybody else to speak for the whole State. I was glad, therefore, to find in his address so much information as to the conditions in Mississippi.

Now, I regret very much there are some expressions in this message which I would omit if possible, for fear of wounding the feelings of my friend from Mississippi, because they do not seem to be up to his plane of proper Democratic principle; but he will see that in order to keep the connection I had to keep in these expressions. Governor Longino, in completing his four years' service, spoke as follows to the legislature:

I desire to reiterate for the purpose of emphasizing now what I had the honor to say in my inaugural address to the legislature four years ago.

He then quotes from what he said four years ago, which I will now read. Picture to yourselves that he had just entered upon a four years' term of service as governor of the State of Mississippi:

It is perhaps meet to say here that now when the tidal wave of new industrial development seems to have struck the State, and capital is hunting investment here, a liberal and just legislative policy should be presented toward all kinds of corporations and corporate interests. It should be remembered that no country ever became truly prosperous or great where a becoming regard was not shown for the equal rights of both labor and capital by the laws, the courts, and the people. Experience has shown it to be wise State policy to extend liberal franchises and privileges to such corporate enterprises and offer mutual benefits to labor and the public generally as well as to the money they employ. I confidently hope, therefore, that no more sentimental and prejudicial opposition to railroads or other corporate enterprises will find favor with the legislature so that capital-hunting investment will have no just cause to pass Mississippi and go to other States offering wiser legitimate inducements.

Now, I want to reread this if I can in connection with the remark that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] made about protection deflecting capital that was profitably employed into channels where it would be unprofitably employed; and I ask him—and there will be time yet, either to-day or some other day—to explain whether this money that has gone into Mississippi has been deflected into unprofitable enterprises. That ends the governor's quotation from his message of four years ago, and now comes the message of three weeks ago, showing how well the legislature lived up to his advice. I think it is hardly necessary for me to ask my friend from Mississippi whether the legislature to which this advice was given was a Democratic or a Republican legislature.

This sentiment shared by both executive and legislature gave confidence to investment. Thus encouraged by liberal laws and tempted—tempted by unequaled opportunities for profitable investment capital has poured into the State by millions and given to Mississippi an industrial, manufacturing, and commercial importance and thrift never before enjoyed by our people.

[Applause.]

I am glad of it. We are all glad of it. I was very much surprised. I could not have taken the words of the Clarion Ledger alone for it, and it was only the verbatim address of the governor that made me confident that this good news was true that "capital has poured into the State by millions and given to Mississippi a prosperity that she has never enjoyed before." I am glad of it, and the country is glad of it.

The governor goes on and quotes from the annual report of the secretary of state, in which he says:

That during the years from 1900 to 1903 747 corporate charters were granted, representing a capital of $73,000,000, as against an issue of 365 charters in the four years from 1896 to 1899, aggregating a capital of $25,000,000, although during the earlier four-year period, from 1896 to 1899, only a $3 fee was charged for each charter.

Whereas during this latter period (that is, the four years of great prosperity) these charters were charged up according to the capital stock. Now, you see, you have this careful arrangement by the secretary of state of Mississippi into an eight-year period, from 1896 to 1899 and from 1900 to 1903, and during all this period money has been coming in there by the millions, and the prosperity and the manufacturing enterprises and granting of charters have continually increased. Then, commenting on this, the secretary of state says:

The increase in the amount of business in the State during the eight-year period—

Now, mark this, not something sporadic, not something due to the boll weevil, not something due to adventitious circumstances, but "the increase in the amount of business in the State during that eight-year period"—the period of Republican administration of this country—has been healthy, steady, and rapid each year, showing marked progress over its predecessor. The assessed value of the property of the State in 1899 was $182,275,900, while in 1903 the value of the State's property aggregated $252,000,000.

[Applause.]

And then the governor says:

I feel safe in venturing the assertion that Mississippi stands among the foremost, if not in the lead, in the rank of railroad building—

I therefore commend—

Remember, this was just three weeks ago—to this legislature a continuance of the liberal policies which characterized the course of your predecessors and feel that nothing will be done by you to check the State's great progress.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Stand pat! [Applause.]

Mr. BOUTELL. That seems to be what might be called a condensed version of the address of the governor of Mississippi.

Well, now, such in brief—and I wish for your sakes, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, that it had been briefer—is the story of prosperity in the "solid South" and the State of Mississippi during the year which has just closed. You will notice that they have all predicted equal if not greater prosperity in the future, and as confirming that prediction I will read just a few words from one of the trade reports, bringing the figures down to the week ending January 1, 1903, which says:

Confidence in a prosperous spring trade finds support in an enlarging volume of business in southern and southwestern markets, an awakening of interest at some of the northwestern centers, and growth even at central, western, and eastern markets, where, however, weather conditions are a drawback to the fullest activity.

The good prospects coming into realization during the third week in January are altogether in the South and Southwestern States. Now, from the bank clearings for the third week ending January 21, I find this splendid showing, that in nineteen southern cities there has been an increase in bank clearings from one-tenth of 1 per cent in the western city of Kansas City up to 105 per cent in Jacksonville, Fla., and 133 per cent in the city of Memphis, Tenn.:

BANK CLEARINGS FOR THE WEEK.

The following table, compiled by Bradstreet, shows the bank clearings at the principal cities for the week ended January 21, with the percentage of increase and decrease as compared with the corresponding week last year:

City.	Amount.	Percentage of—
		Increase.	Decrease.
St. Louis	$56,167,628	14.5
Kansas City	22,194,608	.1
New Orleans	25,146,323	34.8
Richmond	5,219,286	15.4
Savannah	4,147,007	1.6
Memphis	6,744,846	133.7
Atlanta	3,451,828	2.7
Nashville	2,968,291	8.8
Norfolk	1,993,273	22.3
Augusta, Ga	1,791,287	10.8
Birmingham	1,262,656	10
Knoxville	1,498,691	25
Macon	867,000	9.9
Lexington	654,925	4.8
Chattanooga	788,441	18
Jacksonville, Fla	779,294	105.5
Houston	18,223,113	16.9
Galveston	9,770,000
Charleston	1,287,419

Now, Mr. Chairman, such is the story as told by the local newspapers of the industrial and financial conditions through the State of Missouri and the whole South.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. BOUTELL. I would like not to be interrupted for a moment until I complete this.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Just this——

Mr. BOUTELL. If the gentleman from Alabama will kindly suspend.

Such, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, is the bright story told by the local newspapers throughout the State of Missouri and the Southern States. Is it not good news that this story brings? Is it not splendid news? Is it not glorious news? I ask the gentlemen from the districts where these papers are published, Is it not true news?

Isn't it something that we are all glad of aside from any political reason which one or another may give for this situation? We are all glad of it, Mr. Chairman, as American citizens. There never was, perhaps, a sadder sight in the history of the world than the condition of the Southern States at the close of the awful war of 1861 to 1865. I sometimes think, my friends on this side of the Chamber—you who bore arms for the North in that conflict, I am sure, will agree with me—that we have failed to appreciate what an awful blow that war was to the South. The bloodiest battlefields in the history were fought in her territory. The people had lost all their property. The wives and mothers and sisters who had buried their dead did not even have the means with which to erect lasting monuments to their memory. All over the South forty years ago, in almost every county, there were burying grounds of southern soldiers with no soldier's monument. Those who mourned were unable to place any memorial over their dead except the fading tribute of flowers. They were unable to write any inscription over their dead except with their tears.

But now it has all changed and we all rejoice in the new and better order of things. I am glad of all that this story tells for the sake of the wives and mothers and the sisters of these soldiers who lost their lives in that war.

Stoop, angels, hither from the clouds;
There is no holier spot of ground
Than where defeated valor lies
By mourning beauty crowned.

[Applause.]

We rejoice, too, Mr. Chairman, for the sake of those who went back from the war, the young men who went back from Appomattox, taking their horses with them by command of our magnanimous leader, who found their homes in ruins and their fields devastated, and who for forty years have paid without complaint these taxes which have been most largely spent at the North. Now they are coming to their own again, and we congratulate them.

Mr. Chairman, I am glad of this bright story from the South for one personal reason, let me say to my southern friends. The first murmuring of that awful struggle came to me as a child of 5 in a little quiet New England town. I had a father and six near of kin in the northern army, and of course I remember some of the bitterness that raged between the two sections. In the chances of war I landed as a youngster in western Missouri, and finally in the State of Lincoln and Grant. Of course, for many years following, the bitterness between the two sections was kept up. All that is over and gone. I see before me, among my best friends, the sons of those who lie in Confederate graves, and during the last few years I have thanked God daily in my heart that I have lived to see the day when the last trace of bitterness between the two sections of this country has vanished forever. [Great applause.]

I am proud that I was granted the privilege of serving in this House with some gentlemen who had been officers in the southern army, and to see them, when the call to arms came in our war with Spain, promptly offering their services.

It was a glorious sight when such soldiers as Lee, of the Old Dominion, and Wheeler, of Alabama, put on the uniform of the United States Army and marched under the Stars and Stripes. [Applause.] But that is not all. These men are growing old. The gray uniforms hang in their houses to-day, but when these great heroes of two wars come to give up all there is of mortality they will be laid in the earth clad in the uniform of the United States Army, with their casket wrapped in the Stars and Stripes. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I hope you will pardon this digression, but it does seem to me that this is an occasion where we can all rejoice in this splendid prosperity, this unequaled prosperity, that exists all through the southern part of our country.

And now I do not claim that this is all due to the Republican protective tariff; not at all. Mr. Chairman, no one who even tried to think as a statesman would ever make any such claim as that. The only claim I make, the only claim the most ardent Republican could make, is, and it can not be denied, that the principle of protection is an American principle; that the principle of protection has always been recognized on our statute books; that the Dingley revenue act is the wisest and most beneficent tariff act for all sections of the country that has ever been placed on the statute book; and this story and that which I have read tend strongly to prove this claim.

This story shows that the blight and mildew which were predicted as the certain results of Republican victory seven years ago can not be found in any part of the country. And so, as the campaign is coming on, the platform of the Republican party needs nothing but its record during the last eight years. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Chairman, I will be glad if the gentleman will not interrupt me at the present time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. BOUTELL. And, Mr. Chairman, there is no more doubt about our leader than there is about our platform. [Applause on the Republican side.] I know that some gentlemen on the other side of the House have censured our President for being impetuous; but I want to say, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, that the people of the United States would rather have a President who is impetuous and frank than a President who would be suave and subterranean. The people know what Theodore Roosevelt stands for, and he needs no defense in this House or before the people. I want to tell you that we love him and you fear him for the enemies he has made. [Applause on the Republican side.] Has he forfeited any Democratic esteem because in season and out of season he has been zealous in enforcing the laws against illegal combinations? Censure is the tax that strong men pay for doing right, and Roosevelt has always been a heavy taxpayer of this kind.

Has there been anything in his attitude toward any of the public questions of the day in which he has not shown himself equally strong, frank, and manly in dealing with them? Let me say to those on this side of the Chamber who read with misgiving that this man or that man or the other man in our party is looking for another Presidential candidate that such statements are no new thing in our history. Why, away back, even in the time of George Washington and the early Presidents, every President who was ever elected to a second term had to meet at the close of his first term the intrigues of personal enemies and even the schemes of rivals. And so it has been all the way down through our history.

I want to call attention briefly to the experience of Abraham Lincoln. In 1863, when he was bearing the great burdens that were put upon his shoulders, he had his Horace Greeley, who wanted to see Rosecrans nominated in 1864. Greeley proposed to force Abraham Lincoln to retire, make Hamlin President, and Rosecrans the candidate in 1864. A committee was sent by Greeley to Missouri to ask Rosecrans if he would come into the scheme. He gave them the reply of a brave and devoted soldier, when he said:

> My place is here. My country gave me my education and is entitled to my military service.

Then there was in Mr. Lincoln's Cabinet Mr. Chase, the Secretary of the Treasury, who used his position in the Treasury to further his own candidacy for the Presidency. President Lincoln treated him with as much calmness and courtesy and affability as though he were loyally supporting him, but what happened? The legislature of Ohio instructed all its people for Abraham Lincoln, and when the electoral college met Mr. Lincoln got every vote in the college but 21. Afterwards, with unparalleled magnanimity, he made Mr. Chase Chief Justice of United States Supreme Court.

So it was in the days of Grant in 1872. There were those who were going to replace him with another candidate. The same occurred in the case of Grover Cleveland, and in the case of Mr. Harrison, and four years ago there were rival candidates springing up against William McKinley. So, I want to say to you, my friends on the other side, do not take a bit of comfort in what you see in the newspapers about troubles in the Republican ranks. There is no question as to who will be the nominee of the Republican party. With the record of the Republican party behind it for the last seven years, and no question about our leadership, there can be no question as to the result. Our record will be our platform and Theodore Roosevelt will be our candidate, and he will be reelected by the same kind of majorities that were given to Lincoln, to Grant, and to McKinley.

I tell you, my friends on the other side of the Chamber, if there were not so many among you down in your country who are merely what I call "geographical Democrats" or "social Democrats;" in other words, if you voted your honest convictions on financial and economic questions next November, Theodore Roosevelt would be reelected by as large an electoral vote as was given to President Monroe in 1820. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, if I have any further time I yield it to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has no more time.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Then I will ask the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] to yield the gentleman some of his time.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I can not do that. I yield thirty minutes now to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I am sure that nobody in this Chamber has listened with more pleasure to the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL] than I. From grave to gay, from humorous to pathetic, from the actual to the fictitious, he has furnished us pleasure for over an hour. He has proven himself master of the entire gamut of the musical instrument which he accused me of playing, the dulcimer. [Laughter.]

Now, I am not going to allow the gentleman from Illinois to assume either all of the patriotism or all of the pride and pleasure and happiness in the spectacle of American prosperity that can be felt by American citizens. I, too, thank God for the things which we have, though I am not quite ready to "stand pat" upon them and say that they are "well enough." I have never known things to be "well enough" in this poor, miserable world of ours.

But I am ready to go back in history with the gentleman from Illinois. I am ready, too, to thank God that we are a united citizenry. I am ready to thank God that there are children in this world to-day whose mothers were daughters of Confederate soldiers and whose fathers were sons of Union soldiers. I am, above all, Mr. Chairman, ready to thank God that there does not exist to-day along the Potomac, along the Ohio, and along the southern boundary of Missouri and the southwestern boundary of Texas a line of custom-houses "protecting" us from one another. [Applause.]

I am ready to thank God that Massachusetts can consume the cotton of Mississippi and the sugar of Louisiana, and that Louisiana can consume the iron of Pennsylvania. And I thank God for it, because I know in my heart that if we were separate and independent governments and each was "protecting" itself from the "pauper labor" and "inundation of products" of the other, we would be vastly less happy and less prosperous than we are to-day. [Applause.]

Why, Mr. Chairman, not long ago I went down to Newport News with my good and valued friend, Mr. LACEY, of Iowa; and he told me during the trip that somebody had said to him that there was now no difference between a Yankee and a Southerner, except that one "reckoned" and the other "guessed." Not many days ago in Boston, addressing the "Free Trade League," I announced to them the glad tidings that even that difference had disappeared; that since we had fallen heir to the present incumbent of the White House nobody "reckoned" because there was no basis to "reckon" on [laughter]; that we were all Yankees now, because we were all "guessing" [renewed laughter]; and that nobody could guess even twenty-four hours in advance. [Laughter.]

Why, sir, the gentleman says we have objected to this candidate because he is impetuous. I dare say that perhaps the word he heard was somewhat different from that. Was not the word "cataclysmic" or "earthquakey," or "volcanic," or some other word! Are you sure [addressing Mr. BOUTELL] that it was simply "impetuous?" [Laughter and applause on Democratic side.]

Mr. BOUTELL. Yes, because I read it from the gentleman's speech.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Well, I think not; they must have misquoted me.

Now, another thing: We are not, as the gentleman apprehends, taking any comfort out of the fact that other candidates are arising to oppose the renomination of the present incumbent of the White House. On the contrary, we are shaking in our boots for fear that some of them may succeed. [Laughter.] The comfort we are taking is out of the fact that you have gone so far that you can not go back, and you are obliged to nominate him. [Applause on Democratic side.] You have got to "stand pat" on him, together with all the other things.

About a year ago a number of your State conventions swore that the horse was "eighteen feet" high, and as you have announced a general all-round "stand pat" policy you have got to keep on swearing that that horse is "eighteen feet high."

Why, my friends, I do love to listen to the gentleman from Illinois. There is nothing that pleases me so much as a public speech of his, except perhaps a private conversation with him. But I love to listen to his public speeches because he is so sweet mannered in his cocksureness of everything, and so remarkably amusing in his hatred and contempt of Thomas Jefferson.

Mr. BOUTELL. On the contrary, I have a very high regard for most of Thomas Jefferson's opinions.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes; it is that sort of "regard" I heard that an Irishman had for a candidate; when he was asked to "go for him," he said "I went for him last night; I tried to smash his nose all over his face." [Laughter.] I never hear the gentleman expressing any "regard" for Thomas Jefferson; I always hear him trying to "smash his nose all over his face."

The gentleman this morning quotes something about Mr. Jefferson wanting to know if he had a coat of arms. In his day nearly everybody had a coat of arms. Unfortunately for poor old Thomas Jefferson he was derived, as I am, from common Welsh stock and he could not find any coat of arms. But George Washington found one and sported it everywhere; and I have never heard anybody blame him for it. [Laughter.]

The next step was that the gentleman suggested a coat of arms for Mr. Bryan. Will he permit me to suggest a coat of arms for his candidate—"the man that everybody is for and nobody wants." [Laughter.] I would suggest a caricature that I saw in the Post not long ago—the face of a certain Republican upbuilder and organizer upon a dog's body, looking down in a very dignified and good-humored, though somewhat contemptuous, manner, and a little child, with the beatific countenance upon him that we know so well at the other end of the Avenue, looking at him and saying, "Can't you talk?" [Laughter.]

Or, if you are not willing to "stand pat" on that coat of arms, I will suggest another of a more serious character, another caricature that I saw in another paper—a man astride of a cannon marked "Presidential Cannon," with his back to the muzzle and his face to the breech, with a whole lot of groundlings whose ears he tickles, out behind the breech, throwing up their caps and huzzaing, and the man who is playing with the Presidential Cannon touching it off every now and then to see if it would hit anything, but in absolute ignorance of what was in front of it and in absolute recklessness of what was in front of it, too. So much for coats of arms, my friends.

The gentleman says I played upon the dulcimer. I wish I were a musician and could play upon some instrument to the glory and the honor and the praise of Democracy and of its father, Thomas Jefferson. I would not mind even it were a dulcimer; but the gentleman has played upon the dulcimer this morning, and in playing upon it he has spent quite a long while eloquently and genially and intellectually, too, singing as he played the praises of God and the American farmer, but leaving people to infer that in somehow or other the Republican party was responsible for God and the American farmer. [Laughter.]

Why, do you know, I dislike very much to sink to the ordinary anecdotal phraseology of Abraham Lincoln upon an occasion of this magnitude and dignity. I love dignity, you know; but an old anecdote of Abraham Lincoln occurs to me. The gentleman gets propter hoc and post hoc and everything else mixed up. He gets certain things occurring accidentally together with an accidental Republican administration, and then he couples these things together and would have you believe—although he is too honest to come out and say so, still the object of his speech is to have the reader of it draw the inference—that the Republican party is somehow responsible and in some way to be credited for it all. Abraham Lincoln once said that there was a woodpecker away up in the top of a tree, pecking and pecking and pecking at the tree, and after a while a windstorm came along and blew down the tree and the woodpecker; and the woodpecker believed to its dying day that it pecked the tree down. [Laughter.]

The gentleman tells me that the South is prosperous. Of course the South is properous.

Mr. BOUTELL. But we never heard it from the other side of the House during the last three months.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Why, you have heard it from me, I am sure. Of course the South is prosperous. Do you know what I am going to do? I am going to get as many copies of the gentleman's speech as the gentleman from Illinois in his generosity will allow me to have, and I am going to distribute them as an immigration pamphlet for the South. Does he think that he can take any more pride or pleasure in the prosperity of Dixie Land than I can? I imagine he can not. I want to use that speech as an immigration inducer. We want more white people down South. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

They will help us to solve our great problem. Of course the South is prosperous, and the South would have been doubly as prosperous as it is to-day under Democratic local administrations all over the South but for the dread ten years' history of Republican misrule there. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And the South would be trebly as prosperous as it is to-day but for the indefinite, vague dread of some sort of an outside superimposition of Africanization through the Republican party at some day in the future. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Why, the South was rich enough this year to finance her own cotton crop; and when the men that knew the cotton crop was short went up to New York and wanted to borrow money, they said: "We will stop this little thing. We will not lend them a cent." Hitherto in the history of the country whenever they said that, that did stop it; but this year they went right down to New Orleans and Charleston and the other southern cities and borrowed every bit of it.

And I will tell you another thing. I will be still prouder than I am now of the fact that this is a reunited country and that South and North stand together, whenever you cease to let ooze out of you unconsciously the conviction down in your own hearts that we are not the children, but the stepchildren, of the Republic. There are two unwritten laws in America to-day.

Gentlemen talk to me about being reunited and all under one Government and proud of it, and we are proud of it and glad of it; but there are two unwritten laws in this country to-day equally unjust. We boast that we have absolute religious freedom and equality, and yet no Roman Catholic, if he were the wisest man in the land, could possibly be nominated for the Presidency; so we boast that we have absolute sectional peace and equality, and you boast of your magnanimity, and yet it is a known fact that no Southerner, if he were the wisest and most patriotic man in the land, and if he drew the breath of life for the first time as late as 1866 or 1867, after the unpleasantness was over, could be nominated for the Presidency of the United States, or if nominated could be elected.

The gentleman asks me a question about the millions capital that have floated into the State of Mississippi. He asks me if it had been deflected from otherwise profitable pursuits, as I said was the case with capital drawn by legislation into industries created by a tariff. I will answer the gentleman by saying this: not one dollar of the millions was drawn to the State of Mississippi for cultivating one single protected article upon the Dingley schedules. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That capital was not drawn by protectionism. It was therefore not hothoused out of some other pursuit and not deflected from use in otherwise profitable pursuits. Why, the State of Mississippi is the most purely agricultural State in this Union.

With an area of about the State of Iowa, perhaps not so much, 46,000 square miles, she has a population of a million and a half of people, and yet has only one town in her entire borders of 20,000 population; only two that pretend to have 12,000 to 15,000, and all the balance of the people live as their Teutonic ancestors did in Europe, and as their English ancestors did in Great Britain, out in the country, living the life of independent countrymen, in God's free air, learning to do all things, not a slave to the division of labor, where a man drives a tack, tack, tack, with a piece of machinery all day long, until he forgets how to think.

What does the protective tariff have to do with all this prosperity that the gentleman was singing about this morning? Has the protective tariff raised the price of cotton to 15 cents a pound, or, as it was yesterday, 16 cents a pound in New York? It has only taxed the cotton raiser on nearly everything he buys—implements, gins, fence wire, etc. Does a gentleman of common sense upon that side dare to stand upon this floor to-day or to-morrow and say that a protective tariff has given value to the oats and to the corn and to the cattle and mules that have been raised in the State of Mississippi? America exports all of these. Is there a gentleman upon that side who will say, that with regard to the heavy cotton goods that are manufactured in the State of Mississippi and are sold in competition with Germany and England in China and Manchuria and other world markets where the greater part of those Southern goods are sold, that they owe a particle of the prosperity of their makers to your protective tariff?

The South does not owe but one thing to you, and it does not owe that to you as the Republican party. It owes it, however, to I do not know how many millions of men—about two millions on one side and six hundred thousand on the other—who met one another bravely in battle and settled a long-disputed question that could not be settled any other way. It owes, perhaps, something to the result of that conflict; and what it owes to this result is simply this: That the magnificent broad area of free trade, carrying welfare with it from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from the Gulf to the Canadian border, is not divided in the middle by customs-houses. [Applause on Democratic side.] I am sure that is no latter-day Republican doctrine, whatever it may have been earlier.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have not had any time to make an elaborate reply to my friend from Illinois, who seems to have grown tired of this "standing pat," and wants now to go backward. This morning his discourse might have been divided into two heads——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I yield to the gentleman sufficient time to finish his remarks.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I shall not take much time.

Mr. PAYNE. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I do not know; ten or fifteen minutes.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask unanimous consent that he have ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia yields to the gentleman.

Mr. BOUTELL. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that he will have all the time he wants. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman's remarks might have been divided into two parts, unlike the ancient Gaul which was divided into two parts, but into two parts like the Republican party to-day. One part was his desire to quit "standing pat" and taking a position in Congress on past issues, or at any rate not live issues, to see if he could not put Democracy on the defensive, and the other was the cheap, often sung and ancient song that "steers are worth six cents in Missouri." While the gentleman speaks of a past and honored leader of the Democracy, able, patriotic, and honest, who can not be belittled, because he does not deserve belittlement, as being a Nebuchadnezzar, I call attention to the fact that the Republican party to-day is not even a Nebuchadnezzar. It can not even "eat grass." It can not do anything except "stand pat" [laughter], standing pat with its head up and its eyes shut, and it will starve to death and starve the country, or else get knocked in the head and thrown aside if it does not give up its attitude pretty soon. [Applause on Democratic side.]

Now, I did not say that every man who believes that the Dingley tariff bill was a good bill was a fetich worshiper. I said every man who said it was the duty of a great party in the interest of the country to "stand pat" upon every schedule of it was a schedule fetich worshiper, and what else are you if you are not that? You must have one of two reasons for "standing pat" upon every single solitary schedule of a bill after parts of it have proven too high, even from your own standpoint. It must be either because of the worship of the schedule or it must be because you are afraid to touch it.

Now I know you all too well to believe that the latter reason can possibly be the reason actuating you in "standing pat." I do not believe you are at all afraid. Some people have insinuated that you thought may be if you opened the matter up all sorts of differences in your ranks might appear; objections might come from Iowa, out amongst the "new idea" people; some from Minnesota, and that Michigan might have a word to say, and Boston might have something to say, especially upon the coal question and Canadian reciprocity, but I do not believe you are really afraid of one another. Are you?

Somebody has insinuated that maybe if you didn't "stand pat" that New England might want to put hides on the free list and the hide men might want to reduce duty on shoes 50 or 75 per cent; but I do not think so meanly of you as to believe you are afraid of your hide men, or your boot men, or your shoe men. Of course not. You are surely braver than that. It is simply because way back in your hearts schedule worship has become your religion, and, by the way, you have about ceased to have any other religion. You just worship the tariff schedules and the old song, "Beeves are worth 6 cents a pound in Missouri." The gentleman says, however, we have worshiped fetiches, and I think he is a little bit unfair in a part of that argument.

In 1896 the Democratic party went before this country, not crying, as he says, for silver and nothing else, but crying for bimetallism and for the equal coinage of both metals at a fixed ratio—for the law of Andrew Jackson's Administration. The Democratic party at that time adopted as its slogan that without a substantial increase in the volume of metallic, self-dependent, self-sufficing, self-redeeming, price-fixing, real money, there could not be a scale of rising prices, that there would continue to be a scale of falling prices.

But it is true that the Democratic party at that time thought that the only possible manner in which it could get an increase in the volume of metallic money was through the free coinage of silver. With the lights then before it, it could not have hoped for it from any other source, unless its members and leaders had been seers or prophets. It is true that since that time God, who is so much kinder to His children than their elected legislators are, has mapped out a way by means of which what they sought in 1896 has been accomplished. They have gotten through the act of God and by human intelligence and invention through the instrumentality of gold that which they sought from human legislators through the instrumentality of silver. What has occurred?

Why, I remember standing upon this floor in 1893 and some gentleman said, "Does the gentleman from Mississippi pretend that the world could absorb $210,000,000 a year of silver production?" I replied in my poor, weak, and modest way, that I thought it could at a slight and gradual increase of prices. At that time the production of gold was a hundred and nine million. I have not seen the figures lately, but from the last I saw the production of gold was $340,000,000 per year, more than all the silver and all the gold of all the world put together at the time when we were making that fight in 1893 upon this floor, and we do not owe it to the Republican party; we owe it partly to accident under the providence of God, in the way of discovery of new gold mines; we owe still more to the inventions and new methods by which incorrigible ores are treated. The world has easily absorbed the increase with only a moderate rise in the scale of average prices.

Mr. BOUTELL. Will the gentleman kindly yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. BOUTELL. Would the gentleman now favor a return to the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, and would you make that a part of your national contention?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I will answer that right now, sir. You know frankness is my fault.

Mr. BOUTELL. Otherwise I should never have asked that question.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I have no more doubt now, speaking for myself, than I had in 1893 or in 1896, of the correctness of the underlying economical principles which justified our appeal for bimetallism. I have no doubt at all of this proposition that God has fixed the price of metallic money just by the same law that He has fixed the price of wheat and cotton, of the dancing ballet girl, or an opera singer, by the law of supply and demand, by corelation of a number of people who make an effective demand for a product and the supply of the product itself.

I have no more doubt than I have had in all my life that under the will of God the law of supply and demand, which fixes the price of wheat and cotton, also fixes the price or purchasing power of real or metallic money. I know that God did not raise up a golden image and fall down before it and worship it, and say to metallic money: "Thou alone art exempt from this universal law of value, determining market prices." Therefore, when three hundred and forty millions of metallic money are being added to the crop of money in the world each year—real money, not promises to pay money, which are no more money than promises to pay horses are horses—when that has taken place, then resulted the rising scale of prices which we have had for several years.

Mr. BOUTELL. Has not the gentleman lost sight of my question?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. No, I am leading back to your question.

Mr. BOUTELL. Sixteen to 1; that is the question.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I am leading back to 16 to 1. Now, I have no doubt of the fact also that when the great wars took place in England—and all historians have come to that conclusion—that the Stuarts had historical precedents for a great many of their actions—but no English statesman would discuss, except academically, the issues of the days of the Stuarts.

Mr. BOUTELL rose.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I am going to answer the gentleman.

Mr. BOUTELL. I am going to help the gentleman out.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. No, you are not. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOUTELL. I am; I withdraw my question. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I decline; I am about to answer it. I have no doubt of that proposition. I have no doubt of several other things that have come about in this world and have passed away. I have no doubt of this fact, that parties do not make issues, but that conditions make issues, and issues make parties, and that the time and circumstances immediately antecedent to and accompanying the time and circumstances make conditions. Now, then, it is not left for any man nor any party to make a platform which shall be a real issue; time and circumstances and conditions make it, and the conditions which I have outlined have been such that the silver question is relegated to the rear. [Applause.]

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. May I ask the gentleman a question right there?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi (continuing). Now, mind you, I am not saying what will be in any platform in the land; that is not my business. The gentleman has asked me a question as a Representative on this floor, and I have answered it as a Representative from the Eighth district of Mississippi—as plain Mr. WILLIAMS, standing simply in his own poor, plain shoes, answering for nobody but himself. [Applause.]

Mr. BOUTELL. May I say that I expected the gentleman from Mi sissippi would give just that answer, and I congratulate him on that conclusion.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. If the House will excuse me a moment for uttering a little language perhaps in the minds of some of you almost traitorous; when I go back and study the circumstances surrounding the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, and the debates in the Constitutional Convention, and the history of the time when some of the people in New England threatened to secede—the Hartford convention times—when neither Thomas Jefferson nor James Madison denied that they had no right to do it, if they chose, and when I take all that and the Constitution as I find it, I believe as an academic and historical proposition that my old grandfather, in his day, was right in saying that a State had a technical, constitutional right to secede, but I am not fool enough to be raising that issue right now. [Great applause.] Moreover, if I did raise it, and either party indorsed it, nobody but the platform makers would pay any attention to it.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I understood the gentleman to say that prosperity for the last few years had been largely due to the increased production of gold continuously for a few years. I would like to ask the gentleman if he thinks it would have any effect on his argument to remember that during the African-Boer war the Transvaal mines were closed, and that there has been a reduction in the output of gold during these years of increased prosperity, so that the argument of the gentleman falls to the ground.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I have put into the RECORD, in a speech that will come out to-morrow, which I made the other day, clippings, showing that approximately as long as the annual crop of gold kept up, the annual increase of productive enterprise and the scale of rising prices went on. I did not put them there for that purpose, however.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Then, why does it not fall when your production goes down?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. It does soon after. Prices are beginning to go down, and have been going down for a year.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. The amount of gold is now rising.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I know that, and it will probably soon brace things up; but the effect can not be counted the minute the gold is gotten out of the mine. Does not the gentleman know that the crop of anything does not count until it begins to get into the market? The amount of gold that was mined last year did not affect the price last year, nor even this year as yet hardly. It takes some time for it to go where it is coined and minted, and it takes time to distribute it from the mint among the people, where it begins to constitute a part of the effective demand for products. Nor is there any exact mathematical relationship between supply and demand in wheat, cotton, gold, or anything else, because after all it is a corelation, not of the actual supply and actual demand, but of the estimated supply and estimated demand—the estimate going all over the world.

Now, then, the gentleman said that we worshiped another fetich, and he said that fetich was our opposition to the annexation and retention of the Philippine Islands. Well, if that be a fetich, if anticolonialism be an idol, George Washington not only worshiped it but fought for it; and if Jefferson wrote for it, and Patrick Henry spoke for it, and the men at Valley Forge starved for it, and the men at Kings Mountain killed Ferguson for it, and the men at Guilford's Courthouse ran over the British dragoons for it, and the Democratic party has not quit it yet [Applause on the Democratic side], if colonialism is another thing you want to "stand pat" on, stand pat, then, on your un-American, old European, military-camp, grab-nation policy of indefinite colonialism. What are you going to do about this Philippine question, anyhow? Why, I see there is some hedging beginning already.

I saw not long ago that some prominent gentleman, I think it was Professor Schurman, said that Mr. McKinley had told him that he never had any idea of permanently retaining the Philippine Islands; that he just wanted to carry them through a sort of kindergarten process and turn them loose after a while; but if you want to stand pat upon the proposition of indefinite colonialism in the Philippines—if you want to stand pat upon the proposition of killing human beings then and there, or thereafter, or hereafter, in order to "do business,"—then God help you! And only the infinite mercy of God could help you. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It reminds me of a story I heard about old Meredith P. Gentry, in Tennessee. He had run for governor or something and been defeated by Andrew Johnson. He was an old-line Whig and quite an aristocrat in his way. He had a contempt for Johnson, and when Johnson defeated him he felt badly, not so much because he had been run over, but because, as the boys said, he "had been run over by that calf." He went into a state of decline, and soon after that his wife died and Gentry became more and more melancholy until finally a lot of old-line Whigs around Knoxville concluded to invite him to Knoxville to the house of old Dr. Sandy Williams, and have a party of friends meet him there and have a nice time and make him forget his sorrows.

They got Gentry there, and among others of the old-line Whigs who came was Parson Brownlow, one of the uncles of the gentleman who now represents an East Tennessee district. Parson Brownlow was "powerful in prayer," as they say down South, and in those days the gentlemen had their long-necked demijohns with their whisky, and they drank until pretty late at night. Then they would have prayers, because they all belonged to the church and were religious. Late at night old Sandy Williams, who was the host upon the occasion, said: "Gentlemen, you know it is the custom in my house, whenever there is a minister of the gospel present, to have prayers before we retire. Brother Brownlow will now (in the words of the Speaker), 'lead us in prayer.'" [Laughter.]

Thereupon Brother Brownlow, who was powerful in prayer, arose. He prayed for the rich and for the poor. He prayed for the ignorant and for the learned. He prayed for this country and for all countries, and especially prayed for the beloved Commonwealth of Tennessee. Then he began to pray for his friends and the friends of those who were there, and then he touched upon Meredith P. Gentry's case and prayed for him, that God might send a salve to heal the wounds that had been wrought in him and close up the gaps that had been made in his political constitution. He prayed for Gentry very pathetically and eloquently. All of the gentlemen had had their toddies, and Gentry was kneeling down by the sofa and could be heard audibly to sob as Brownlow referred to the fact that his good wife, one of the sweetest woman in Tennessee, had died a short time before, and referred to the beautiful relationship between them, the fact that she had gone and left him comfortless at the very hour when he most needed her.

Then the parson expanded and began to pray for everything; and he finally said, "And, O Lord, if in Thy infinite mercy it be possible, have mercy also upon Andrew Johnson and John M. Savage." Then it was that Meredith P. Gentry, great man and great statesman as he was, arose with the tears streaming down his face and said, "Stop, Mr. Brownlow, stop; you will exhaust the fount of infinite mercy." [Prolonged laughter.] And sometimes when I feel like praying to God to have mercy upon you all in this new pathway of colonialism, recklessness, land robbery, and greed that you have marked out for yourselves under the guise of carrying the white man's burden and introducing "civilization," by gunshot wounds, into the brown man's home, I am almost afraid to pray for fear it may be blasphemous, in that it might possibly exhaust the fount of infinite mercy. [Prolonged applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

But my friend, whose hatred of Thomas Jefferson is so amusing, says that Thomas Jefferson on August 25 and November 25, 1775, wrote letters in which he said that America would rather be dependent upon Great Britain than upon any other government, and indeed would rather be dependent upon Great Britain than upon no government; and he seems to think, student of history as he is—and by the way he is perhaps the man in this House best educated in my opinion upon historical questions——

Mr. BOUTELL. Thank you.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman seems to think that he has discovered a mare's nest. Nobody but a Federalist or a political descendant of a Federalist would be misled that far, my friends. That was in August and November, 1775. It was not very long after the last date when George Washington crossed the Potomac River on his way to the first Congress of the Colonies and being accosted by an old Episcopal rector with the remark, "Mr. Washington, if you all go on with this, it will end in a Declaration of Independence or in a rebellion;" and George Washington's reply substantially was, "I would cut off my arm first." The gentleman will remember also that about that same time Benjamin Franklin told Pitt that "he had never heard independence mentioned by a man in America." In other words, Thomas Jefferson and George Washington and the colonies were driven to desperation and rebellion.

They were trying by every means within their power to get Great Britain to reconsider her idea of undefined and unlimited colonialism in America—her idea of subjecting people subject to the flag of Great Britain upon the continent of America to one law, while people subject to the flag of Great Britain in the islands of Great Britain were subject to another. They were pleading first as loyal subjects against a system the exact forerunner of what you are now practicing under the flag of the Union in the Philippines. They pleaded; they prayed most humbly; they sent up appeal after appeal to King and to Parliament. They would rather have remained with Great Britain; they would rather have been dependent upon her than any other country; they would rather have been dependent upon her than upon no country. British soldiers coming over here had joined with the Colonial troops led by George Washington in Virginia, and led by others in New England, and they had fought side by side against the French and the Indians for the maintenance of the supremacy of the English-speaking race upon the continent of America.

Every liberty that America prized most highly had come down from the English common law. Nearly every drop of blood in the veins of American citizens at that time was English—Cromwellian or Stuart, or whatever may have been the line of political demarcation in the old country. They were anxious to remain under the flag; they were anxious to do it provided they could do it with honor and provided the protection of the flag could be equal, and justice could be dealt out to them. They would have been subjects of Great Britain to-day but for the fact that King George III anticipated on the part of Great Britain the sort of infernal policy that you are now applying to the Philippine Islands, and with obstinacy equal to yours persisted in it. The only difference is that he met a strong and virile people and failed, while you have met a weak and inferior race, who have succumbed. I beg your pardon, there is another difference; English tyranny in America never compared in actual virulency, oppression, and greed to your tyranny in the Philippines. There is another yet: it frankly confessed that it proposed to exploit America; in the interest of British trade and empire, and hid behind no hypocritical pretense of oppression for the sake of the oppressed, "bearing the white man's burden," or "benevolent assimilation."

I do not want to retain or annex any people whom we can not really assimilate, and you can not assimilate any inferior race with whom you will not intermarry. That is the real test of a real assimilation.

Mr. BOUTELL. Will the gentleman yield a moment? Of course, Thomas Jefferson thought that a continued union with Great Britain under such circumstances did not amount to much. I was simply referring to that by way of explanation——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. But you said I was always praising him, and you wanted to attack me on that ground.

Mr. BOUTELL. I was referring to the position of Jefferson when he favored dependence——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman allow me to finish the line of remark in which I was engaged? I fear I shall lose the train of thought.

Mr. BOUTELL. I thought that in that same connection it might be well to put in the name of that other distinguished son of the Old Dominion, Patrick Henry, as well as the names of Alexander Hamilton and Sam Adams, who did not want dependence on Great Britain on any terms whatever.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. When Patrick Henry, "the tongue of the Revolution," introduced his celebrated resolutions into the Virginia house of burgesses, which were voted through, and two of which were reconsidered the next day, it was young Thomas Jefferson, who subsequently proved "the pen of the Revolution," who was standing at the door of the house and cheered the orator to the echo.

It was Thomas Jefferson, this man whom you try to decry, who had the courage always to draw state papers during that controversy, that always went too far for George Washington and the Lees and the Pendletons and Dickersons and Witherspoons and the Franklins and the balance of them. Not a paper of his was ever rejected because it did not go far enough; several of them were rejected because they went too far. Conservative men thought his positions too advanced, and when he saw and advocated the necessity of a total independence of Great Britain but few others went so far. To do him justice, old Samuel Adams was one who was abreast with him, if not in advance of him.

They talk about Thomas Jefferson, Mr. Chairman. They have got on my hobby now. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] A distinguished accidental incumbent at the other end of an avenue in this city has gone so far as to speak of him as having been cowardly. A coward! A man who dared confess a disbelief in the divinity of Christ and be a candidate for the Presidency in the eighteenth century? A coward! The man who dared drag up by the roots primogeniture and entail against the opposition of all of the old Virginia aristocracy in the Virginia House of Burgesses, against the protests of the Pendletons and the Randolphs and the Lees and the Washingtons and the Harrisons and I believe the Careys and nearly all the balance of them. A coward!

The American President who threw down the gauntlet to Napoleon the Great and informed him of the fact that if the Mississippi River fell into the hands of France it would be a cause of unending conflict between the two nations; who dared say to him, "The only natural enemy of the United States is the owner of the Mississippi Valley;" and who dared to send word to our minister that the emperor must be told plainly that that sort of possession would not be permitted. A coward! The man who dared—why, he was morally one of the most courageous men that ever lived—the man who dared face my Church, the Church of England, and disestablish it in the State of Virginia. A coward!

The man who dared to trust human nature so far that when he built the first elective school university in the world, down here at Charlottesville, Va., which he had named the University of Virginia, dared base it upon self-government amongst the boys themselves, giving no professor or any other body outside of the class room the right to control them, except the officers of the law, telling them to be guided by their honor, and giving them as a maxim "Be free and ye shall be wise."

Oh, this hatred, this old federalistic relic of hatred of Thomas Jefferson would be pathetic if it was not amusing. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois had something to say about my definition of a tariff. I need not repeat it. I will stand by it, and I will stand by the fact, too, that the only way in which you can create an industry under the tariff is by deflecting into that industry, which without law would be unprofitable, labor and capital engaged in other industries, which without law would be profitable, and that this sort of creation of industries merely amounts to a change of men and dollars from one business to another.

Why, the gentleman has this morning dwelt upon the prosperity of the South, and what has caused it. He told about the great buildings that were going up in Kansas City, in Jacksonville, and all over Dixie land, and he might have added, all over many other parts of this country. Let me ask him now, and let him answer, if he can, what the protective tariff had to do with that, except this, that it increased the price of structural iron and structural steel, and made the process of building less in volume and slower in time?

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Chairman, does not the gentleman from Mississippi know that the tariff on structural steel under the Dingley act is less than it was under the Wilson-Gorman bill?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, the answer to my question is the same old dodge; two boys get together and one of them wants to fight the other, and the other looks like he wants to fight, but finally one of them grows into a little bit of a lack of confidence upon the proposition and says, "Let us talk about that fight we had last week." [Laughter.]

If the tariff upon structural steel and iron was higher in the Wilson-Gorman bill than it was under the Dingley bill, and I frankly confess that I do not know whether it was or not——

Mr. BOUTELL. Well, it was, a little.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. And I equally frankly confess that I do not care; it is merely a proof that that is one more place where Democrats made a mistake, that is all.

Mr. BOUTELL. And that they would make just the same mistakes if they were in power again.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. On the contrary. Oh, we have made many mistakes. The only difference between you and us is that we confess them and you never do. [Laughter.]

And another thing, Mr. Chairman. At the time that the Wilson-Gorman bill went into effect there was, from a protectionist's standpoint, some need for protection upon these things. Now to-day they are shipping these very things to the markets of the world outside of America, selling wherever they are not shut out by foreign tariffs in competition with the world's "pauper labor," thereby proving that they have no need of the duty at all, unless they need it for the purpose of extorting higher prices from the home consumer.

Now, the gentleman tells us about the railroads everywhere, and that the earnings of the railroads have increased. Now, I want to call his attention to the peculiar conditions in this respect under Republican administration. The earnings have increased about 33⅓ per cent, he says. I take these figures to be accurate, although I have not looked up the figures.

Mr. BOUTELL. That is the increase in the railroad earnings in the localities referred to in the papers.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I understand that, but there has been an increase throughout the country so far as that is concerned. Now, I read the head lines from the Chicago Chronicle in your own city dated October 18:

[Chicago Chronicle, October 18, 1903.]

Railroad stops all work—Pennsylvania sees hard times coming and economizes—Thousands of men on extension contracts to be dismissed—Traffic outlook does not warrant further expenditures—Nearly $10,000,000 worth of improvements will shut down November 10.

So the workmen are not getting the earnings. There are a good many of these things I will not read, though they will be found in the RECORD in connection with the speech made the other day. Here is a special telegram from Cleveland, October 17:

CLEVELAND, OHIO, October 17, 1903.

Following on the heels of the cut in the force of workmen at the shops of the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern Railroad all over the country comes the annual announcement to-day that, beginning Monday, there will be a reduction in the working hours of a day from ten to nine hours in all the locomotive and repair shops of the Lake Shore company.

This means a reduction in wages not only in the big shops in Collinwood, but also in Chicago, Pittsburg, and other large cities entered by that line. The Lake Erie and Western, a branch of the Lake Shore, is included in the order.

At the headquarters here to-day it was stated that there was not enough work on hand to keep the large forces busy and the reduction in hours was thought to be the best thing to do.

The announcement has caused consternation among the hundreds of workmen in and around Cleveland.

And this telegram from Philadelphia:

PHILADELPHIA, October 20, 1903.

Forestalling action on the part of the 14,000 trainmen on its lines east of Pittsburg in case of a point blank refusal to comply with the demands of the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen, the Pennsylvania Railroad has already made an important move to prevent trouble. As the most forcible object lesson that could be brought to bear upon the men thousands of employees have been laid off, and orders have been issued that the cutting down shall be from 5 per cent of the total force in some departments to 15 per cent in others. Not less than 6,500, and probably 7,500 men will be discharged or suspended as soon as the lists can be made up. This scaling down will fall heavily upon the trainmen, whose demands for shorter hours are now before the officers of the road. By laying off men the railroad will cut down its monthly pay roll between $350,000 and $400,000. High officers of the railroad frankly say that the demands of the trainmen can not be granted. The company, irritated, according to the statements of its officers, by frequent demands on the part of its men, will resolutely refuse to yield an inch.

[From New York Post, October 17, 1903.]

REDUCTION IN RAILWAY FORCES—WHAT THIS WEEK'S ANNOUNCEMENTS MEAN—A REMINISCENCE OF A DECADE AGO—VIEWS OF RAILWAY OFFICERS—EFFECT OF THE ECONOMIES—WHY THE STEP WAS TAKEN.

Steps taken during the week by several of the larger railway systems toward reducing the number of workingmen employed, attracted attention in both financial and railroad circles throughout the country. According to report the railroads of the country will lay off between 15,000 and 20,000 men before January 1, 1903, including 2,500 to be discharged by the New York Central, 1,500 by the Pennsylvania, and an equal number by the Atchison. Union Pacific will dispense with 3,000, the Illinois Central with 1,800, Lake Shore 1,000, Rock Island and San Francisco between 1,000 and 1,500, New Haven 1,000, Michigan Central 500, and Lake Erie and Western 300. These are the rough and unofficial showing.

An order for retrenchment on a scale unknown before in the history of the Southern Pacific has gone forth from General Manager Kruttschnitt's office. Within a few days between 250 and 300 men will be discharged from the various positions along the Coast division, and the service of a proportionate number on the other lines running out of this city will be dispensed with. In all it is expected that the present force of men in the employ of the road on its California lines will be decreased at least 1,200.

One of the first moves made was to consolidate the position of two train dispatchers and a train master on the narrow-gauge system, throwing all the duties of the three places on the shoulders of the latter official, thus saving to the company the salaries of two dispatchers. Then the positions of traveling conductors along the divisions were scratched off the pay roll. Next the recently created positions of train agents were abolished. In the maintenance-of-way department it was decided to lay off 100 men employed on the construction of the double track south of the city. The carpenter force in the local shops of the same department was next to suffer, 35 men being laid off. Then an order went out dismissing various assistants along the coast route. Even the night station agents, whose duty it is to report trains as they pass in the night, were dispensed with.

Some weeks ago a large force of men was discharged from the shops at Sacramento and several in the repair shops in this city are slated to go.

The reduction of the force on the other branches of the western system is proportionately as large as that on the coast division.

[Special to the World.]

BIG LAY OFF PREDICTED—VANDERBILT OFFICIALS SAY OTHER SYSTEMS WILL REDUCE FORCE.

PHILADELPHIA, October 12, 1903.

Early and large reductions in the number of employees of the big railroad systems of the country are predicted by officials of the Vanderbilt lines.

Announcement was made to-day that 1,500 New York Central and West Shore Railroad shophands will be laid off.

When asked whether the Pennsylvania Railroad has materially reduced the number of men on its pay roll or contemplate such action, General Manager Atterbury said:

"We have not reduced our force very much, and only as the exigencies of the service have required."

No men have been laid off yet by the Philadelphia and Reading Railway, whose traffic continues heavy. When a curtailment comes, if it does, it is likely to be in the shops and among the track hands first.

FIVE HUNDRED LAID OFF AT BUFFALO AND DEPEW.

BUFFALO, October 12, 1903.

Following the order to reduce the force of shopmen on the Vanderbilt system, about 500 employees have been discharged here and at Depew.

[Boston Transcript, October 14, 1903.]

RAILROADS REDUCING FORCES—ABOUT 20,000 MEN SOON TO BE DISCHARGED.

NEW YORK, October 14, 1903.

Several railroad companies have announced reductions in their working force, and it is expected that between now and November 1 nearly every railroad in this country will discharge some of its employees. Such action, it is explained, is not unusual at this time of year, but a larger number of men will be dismissed this fall because the railroad companies have been working abnormally large forces since early last spring. A natural falling off in traffic is the reason generally assigned for these railroad dismissals.

Basing their estimates on the reductions already announced experienced railroad men say that between 15,000 and 20,000 men will probably be laid off by the railroads throughout the country this fall. There are about 1,250,000 railroad employees in the United States.

Vice-President Brown of the New York Central thinks that about 2,500 men may be dropped from the pay rolls of that system this month. The greater proportion of the dismissals will be from the car shops.

About 1,500 shopmen, train men, and trackmen will be discharged on the Pennsylvania system. Vice-President Pugh says that most of the men to be dismissed will be recent employees who were hired during the rush period of last spring. Few, if any, of the old employees of the Pennsylvania system are to be discharged, and no important work of improvement is to be suspended.

The Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe operating department will lay off about 500 men this month, and such improvements as can wait will be deferred until next year.

Not less than 3,000 employees will be dispensed with on the Union Pacific and the Southern Pacific systems between now and December 1. These dismissals, it is said, are to be made because the work for which the men were hired is completed. It is probable that all of the transcontinental lines will cut down their working forces some after the crop shipments are over. The falling off in ore shipments has caused some of the western roads to take off about 10 per cent of their freight trains.

The Illinois Central will curtail its operating force anywhere from 600 to 800 men, and the Chicago and Alton will also make a small reduction.

President Ingalls of the Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago and St. Louis system says that at present there is a great volume of traffic over his lines, but he expects that it will be necessary to let some of his employees go as soon as the present rush slackens. The Lake Shore will dismiss nearly 1,000 men this month, and the Michigan Central about half that number. About 300 of the Lake Erie and Western employees will be laid off on November 1.

The Erie management has already dismissed several hundred men from the repair shops and the operating force, and there will be a still further reduction between now and December 1. The West Shore will lay off about 300 men, and the Boston and Albany an equal number. A gradual reduction in the operating force of the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad is now under way, and before the pruning knife is laid away about 1,000 employees of this company will be out of work.

The Missouri Pacific and other Gould lines will reduce their working forces slightly, but there is to be no cessation in works of extension and improvement. The Wabash expects to increase, rather than diminish, the number of its employees on Pennsylvania improvements.

The Rock Island and the Frisco systems will lay off between 1,000 and 1,500 men this month and next.

VANDERBILT LINES RETRENCH—ABOUT 1,500 MEN IN SHOPS ON VARIOUS ROADS DROPPED—SAVING OF $3,000 A DAY.

NEW YORK, October 12, 1903.

Orders have been issued from here whereby 15 per cent of the employees in the car shops, repair shops, and roundhouses of the entire Vanderbilt railway system will be dropped. One thousand five hundred men will be thrown out of employment and a saving of nearly $3,000 a day will be effected.

The order, which embraces employees of the New York Central and all subsidiary lines going out of New York, the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern, the Lake Erie and Western, and other roads, will have its effect in more than 100 shops and roundhouses. It will take 300 men out of the New York Central shops at West Albany, N. Y.; as many more from Depew, N. Y., near Buffalo; a hundred or more from Elkhart, Ind., and Collinwood, Ohio, where the Lake Shore has its shops, and several score from the Lake Erie shops at Lima, Ohio. Besides this, on every division of the entire system where round-house mechanics, wipers, oilers, and laborers are employed, 15 per cent of them must go.

DON'T SHARE IN PROSPERITY—RAILROAD LAYS OFF 200 MEN WHILE BUSINESS NEVER WAS SO GOOD.

ALBANY, October 21, 1903.

Notice was given to-day that the Delaware and Hudson Railroad Company will lay off 200 men, equivalent to 10 per cent of the working force.

Second Vice-President Culver said to-day that increased efficiency of administration, and not industrial depression or labor troubles, was the cause of the reduction.

The road was doing the largest business in its history, he said, but it had been found that the work could be done with a reduced force.

I have never had any doubt that the capitalists got something out of your favoritism.

Mr. BOUTELL. In Mississippi the laboring people are prospering.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes. And they are laboring people who sweat while they plow raising cotton in the field in direct competition with the pauper labor of India and with the felloes of Egypt, and do not ask a bit of prop-up from the Federal Government. [Applause on the Democratic side]. And they are the people in the factories of Mississippi who are making the heavy-weight cotton goods that are shipped to China and Manchuria, and will continue to be shipped to Manchuria unless the Republican Administration allows Russia to close its ports, a thing I very much fear at the present. They have been able to sell that product in China and Manchuria independently of your tariff, although a tariff does exist upon that class of goods. That tariff can not affect the price for those goods in a foreign market.

So it seems that these railroads get the earnings, and not the men working on the railroads. Whenever they want to get higher wages they are locked out, and when they do not ask for higher wages they are reduced.

Now, I will not read any more of these. So much in answer to the proposition that the railroads' earnings have increased 33⅓ per cent. Now, let me show the immense difference between increasing the aggregate wealth of a country and increasing the real prosperity of the people of the same country.

There may be an increased prosperity of the people accompanying an increase in the aggregate wealth, and there may not be. It depends upon how the aggregate wealth is distributed, if every man gets his due share. And if in this great prosperity capital gets an undue share and labor gets no part or parcel or tithe in the movement then you have not got a happy condition for the people, although figures may show great increase of wealth in the aggregate. It is a curious fact that to-day the most prosperous parts of the American Union are the agricultural portions, that protection can not help, because they export their products; and the portions of the country that are beginning to feel distress and what threatens to be a gradual depression are in New Jersey, New York, New England, and Pennsylvania, where many businesses are dependent upon a protective tariff to a very large extent.

Now the gentleman refers to Croker. I will not go into the Croker business, but I can say this with a perfectly clear conscience, that Philadelphia under Republican rule has furnished a thousand Crokers to where New York under Democratic rule has furnished one, and not a single Philadelphia Croker was ever refused admittance into polite society. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. COCHRAN. And St. Louis has furnished an ex-prize fighter and saloon keeper and boss as a delegate to the national convention.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes; though I do not know so much about St. Louis.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, I asked the other day if you would "stand pat" on a number of things. I will not ask you if you will "stand pat" on your candidate, because I know you have to whether you want to or not.

Now, I hold in my hand an article from the Washington Post of Thursday, December 10, which is quoted from the New York Evening Post, and is a summary of the report of Treasurer Shaw.

I have not the voice and lungs nor strength to read it, but I am going to insert it in the RECORD, and I am going to ask you whether you are going to stand pat upon the self-confessed extravagance in the Treasury Department pointed out by your own Secretary of the Treasury; whether you are not going to examine into it through some of these numerous committees upon expenditures in the several departments, and whether if there is anything wrong going on you are going to correct it? Your Secretary says there is wrong. He says there is glaring extravagance which ought to be corrected, and yet he has done nothing under the sun to correct it, and Congress has not taken any part in it.

That is one of the other things I want to ask you whether you are going to "stand pat" upon.

EXTRAVAGANCE CONFESSED—AWKWARD FINANCIAL FACTS PRESENTED IN SECRETARY SHAW'S ANNUAL REPORT.

[From the New York Evening Post.]

If the Democrats are wise they will print Secretary Shaw's annual report as a campaign document. Mr. Shaw is a stanch Republican, but circumstances have compelled him to present the financial situation to the country in a way that is most awkward for his party on the eve of a Presidential election. His report is a model in its way. It states the operations of the year with business-like exactness. It contains but few recommendations, and as a whole these will meet with general approval. And there is only an irreducible minimum of good Republican phraseology.

We are told that, in reforming the currency, "no measure should be considered that will in anywise weaken what is now stable, and no element should be injected that will cause distrust or doubt." If this statement is what the Prayer Book calls a work of supererogation, the same can not be said of Secretary Shaw's allusion to the present condition of the stock market. The "enormous and inconceivable shrinkage" in securities he traces ultimately to "the natural optimism of our people." This does not sound like the pure milk of Republicanism. Who ever before heard a leading spokesman of the party imply that optimism is a dangerous thing?

The striking feature of the report is, however, its evidence of gross extravagance in the conduct of the Government. It shows that while the receipts increased about $10,000,000 over the previous year, expenditures increased about $47,000,000. But that is the smallest part of the showing. Despite the fact just cited, there was a surplus for the year of over $54,000,000, whereas for the next few years it is extremely likely that the balance will be on the wrong side of the ledger. To be sure, a surplus of $14,000,000 is figured for 1904; but we have to compare this with the estimate of nearly $52,000,000 for that period which Secretary Shaw presented a year ago. Certainly, if the receipts and expenditures maintain the same relation for the remainder of the present fiscal year that has been witnessed so far, the Secretary's $14,000,000 surplus will "flit like a ghost away."

When he comes to his 1905 estimates, the Secretary frankly admits a deficit of $23,000,000. This is, of course, a purely arbitrary figure; the real shortage will as likely as not greatly exceed this sum. It may be tolerably easy to calculate expenditures two years ahead, but under our revenue laws the Secretary of the Treasury is all at sea when he comes to forecasting his receipts. He may believe that he can call spirits from the vasty deep, but will they come when he doth call for them? A year or two of even moderate industrial depression would be apt to knock Mr. Shaw's 1905 revenue calculations into a cocked hat; the same may be true even of his 1904 figures.

With this contingency staring it in the face, the nation is confronted with an increase of $87,000,000 in its annual outgo between 1903 and 1905. And the astonishing thing is that the Administration has embarked on this extravagance with its eyes open. It estimates that it will collect about $31,000,000 more in 1905 than in 1904; and then, in cold blood, it arranges to increase its expenditures nearly $67,000,000, knowing that it will thus create a deficit of $23,000,000. Secretary Shaw's figures show that the Navy and the Postal Service are to be the chief beneficiaries of this extravagance. The Navy took $37,800,000 in 1902 and $82,600,000 in 1903; in 1904 it will absorb $96,000,000, and in 1905 it is down for nearly $104,000,000. The Postal Service got $134,200,000 in 1903; in 1904 it will take $144,700,000, and in 1905 $168,000,000. The expediency of building ships and docks and enlarging the rural delivery at this rate, with hard times and falling revenues confronting us, may well be doubted.

It is to be hoped that Mr. Shaw will not soon be exchanging condolences with ex-Secretary Foster. The people did not like the monthly deficits which the latter was obliged to report in 1892, and they decided to replace President Harrison with Mr. Cleveland, despite the former's approval of optimism and his hatred of cheapness. Now, $25,000,000 is a very narrow estimate for an annual surplus, especially when the shrinkage in imports since September 1, 1903, is kept in mind. To forecast no more than that amount is, in existing circumstances, tantamount to a confession of a deficit. It looks as if the Administration may have to fall back on the accumulated surplus, and declare that one or two annual deficits need not bother anybody. In the matter of accumulated surplus, the Republicans of 1908 apparently have a great advantage over those of 1892.

But of the $219,000,000 on hand over $158,000,000 is deposited in the national banks; and it was left there chiefly for the purpose of keeping the general financial and industrial situation from coming to harm. To withdraw it in any amount at a time like this might be worse for the Administration than no surplus at all. Add to this $158,000,000 the $50,000,000 required to indemnify the French Panama Canal Company and "our sister Republic" on the Isthmus, and there is not much left of the surplus. Clearly, the Republican party will be skating on thin ice to enter a Presidential campaign with such a treasury showing as this. The 1904 expenditures must be regarded as fixed, but it looks suicidal in the Administration deliberately to flaunt such estimates as it has prepared for 1905 in the face of the people. Here at least there was a chance for amendment or for urging retrenchment. But Ephraim is apparently joined to his idols.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I owe the House, and especially my own side, a little apology, I think, for undertaking to answer so ornate, elaborate, and well prepared an argument in such an offhand and stringy sort of way; but I have such absolute confidence in the eternal righteousness of Democratic policies, purposes, and principles that I always wade in like David with his miserable little sling no matter if Goliath is prearmed and panoplied in helmet or not, trusting to God and truth for the result.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TAWNEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, reported that the committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 10954, the urgent deficiency bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—CONNELL VS. HOWELL.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Elections No. 3 I present a privileged report and resolutions in the contested-election case of Connell v. Howell, from the Tenth Congressional district of the State of Pennsylvania, and ask that this be referred to the House Calendar and printed, and I further wish to give notice that it will be called up for consideration one week from next Friday, the 5th day of February.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York presents a report from the Committee on Elections, the title of which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Contested-election case of Connell v. Howell (Tenth Congressional district of Pennsylvania).

The SPEAKER. It will be referred to the House Calendar and printed.

Mr. McLAIN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call attention to the fact that the minority is to have until Monday to file the minority report.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Yes; we have agreed on that, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the minority have until Monday next to file their report. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I give notice it will be called up for consideration one week from next Friday——

Mr. TAWNEY. One moment more, Mr. Speaker. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York if he expects a vote to be taken within a day or two after it is called up? If he does, I would suggest to him to place the time for consideration earlier in the week, either that week or the following week, as the gentleman well knows it is almost impossible to keep the House here on Friday and Saturday.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I wish to withdraw that notice, then, and will give notice to-morrow morning of the time when we wish to call it up.

REPRINT OF URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for a reprint of the urgent deficiency bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent for a reprint of the urgent deficiency bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that more time has been consumed this afternoon than was expected, I ask that the time for general debate on the urgent deficiency bill be extended for three hours.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the time for general debate on the urgent deficiency bill be extended three hours.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, one question before that. I suppose, of course, it is the intention if there is any inequality between the two sides as to time that our side shall be compensated by the new time.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. We have thirty minutes of the old time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CLAY. I present a petition from the mayor and general council of the city of Atlanta, Ga., relative to the construction of an interoceanic canal across the Isthmus of Panama. The petition is short, and I ask that it may be read and referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

There being no objection, the petition was read, and referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, as follows:

Whereas for many years the people of our entire country have been greatly interested in the building of an interocean canal across the Isthmus of Panama; and

Whereas the Government of the United States has been unable to negotiate a treaty with the Government of Colombia for the building of such canal; and

Whereas the State of Panama has recently seceded from the Colombian Government and has established an independent government under the name of the Republic of Panama; which independent government is an accomplished fact, and has been recognized by the United States and many other nations; and

Whereas there is now pending before the United States Senate for ratification a treaty negotiated with said newly established Republic, the ratification of which would enable the United States Government to speedily commence the building of said canal:

Resolved by the mayor and general council of the city of Atlanta:

1. That we believe the building of said canal by our Government is one of the greatest needs of the age, that it will be of vast importance to the commerce of the world, and will do much to strengthen the position of the United States Government as one of the great nations of the earth, and will be of great benefit to the city of Atlanta, the State of Georgia, and the entire South.

2. That we respectfully but earnestly urge the Hon. A. O. BACON and the Hon. A. S. CLAY, members of the United States Senate from Georgia, to do all in their power to speedily reconcile the differences existing in the Senate relative to said treaty, and that we respectfully but earnestly urge each of them to vote for the ratification of said treaty when it comes to a vote in the United States Senate.

3. That a copy of these resolutions under the seal of the city be mailed to each of said Senators by the clerk of this council.

GEORGIA, FULTON COUNTY, City of Atlanta:

I, W. J. Campbell, clerk of council of the city of Atlanta, do certify that the foregoing is a true copy of a resolution adopted by the general council on January 20, 1904, and approved by the mayor of said city on January 22, 1904.

In testimony whereof witness my signature and seal of office this January 25, 1904.

PROTECTION OF FUR-SEAL HERD OF ALASKA.

Mr. FORAKER, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. DILLINGHAM November 20, 1903, and referred to that committee, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Whereas the concurrent regulations ordered by the tribunal of arbitration and published August 16, 1893, for the protection and preservation of the fur-seal herd of Alaska, under authority of the treaty of Washington, February 29, 1892, have been found after ten years of faithful enforcement and trial wholly insufficient to serve the purpose for which they were created; and

Whereas this failure of these concurrent regulations, if not corrected at once, will result in the immediate and complete extermination of the fur-seal species in Alaska: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate of the United States that the Government of Great Britain be requested by the Secretary of State to unite with the Government of the United States, without undue delay, in a revision and amendment of the concurrent regulations now in force for the protection and preservation of the fur seals of Alaska, duly established and known as the award of the tribunal of arbitration at Paris, August 15, 1893; and be it further

Resolved, That this request of our Government for the revision of said regulations shall be made at once, so that the British Government shall have a reasonable length of time in which to consider the same before the next pelagic-sealing season opens in February, 1904.

UTAH SENATORIAL INVESTIGATION.

Mr. KEAN. I am directed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution reported on the 25th instant by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to report it with an amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

The amendment of the committee was, in line 6, after the word "Senate," to strike out the words "and during the recess of Congress;" so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the Senate, or any subcommittee thereof, be authorized and directed to investigate the right and title of REED SMOOT to a seat in the Senate as Senator from the State of Utah; and said committee, or any subcommittee thereof, is authorized to sit during the sessions of the Senate, to employ a stenographer, to send for persons and papers, and to administer oaths; and that the expense of the inquiry shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers to be approved by the chairman of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. BALL introduced a bill (S. 3902) granting a pension to George F. Smith; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FULTON introduced a bill (S. 3903) for the relief of the Lower band of Chinook Indians of the State of Washington and the Kathlamet band of Chinook Indians of the State of Oregon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. MARTIN introduced a bill (S. 3904) for the relief of Walter H. Taylor, administrator of Richard Taylor, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PROCTOR introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 34) authorizing the Secretary of War to receive for instruction at the Military Academy at West Point Alfonso Zelaya, of Nicaragua; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FRYE introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 35) to incorporate the American National Institute (Prix de Paris) at Paris, France; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, which were ordered to be printed, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. PENROSE submitted an amendment proposing to amend section 3857 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the designation of post-offices at the intersection of mail routes and termini of rural free-delivery routes as distributing or separating offices, intended to be proposed by him to the post-office appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. MITCHELL submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $1,700 to pay Charles Smith, late deputy collector of customs at Circle City, Alaska, compensation as such from October 1, 1898, to March 31, 1899, and for traveling expenses incurred during said period, intended to be proposed by him to the urgent deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

CORRESPONDENCE RELATIVE TO PANAMA TREATY.

Mr. MORGAN submitted the following resolution, which was read:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State is directed to send to the Senate a copy of a dispatch or letter, dated January 22, 1904, relating to the withdrawal or abandonment of all amendments to the Hay-Varilla treaty, which was sent by the minister of the United States at Panama to John Hay, Secretary of State, in which the reasons for withdrawing the same are stated by Mr. Buchanan, minister to Panama.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama desire action upon the resolution?

Mr. MORGAN. I prefer that the resolution should be printed and lie over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be printed and go over.

HYGIENIC CONDITIONS, ETC., ON ISTHMUS OF PANAMA.

Mr. MORGAN submitted the following resolution, which was read:

Resolved, That the following official documents, and the hearings before the Committee on Interoceanic Canals in 1902, and the statements of Merrill A. Teague, special correspondent of the Montgomery Advertiser, herein set forth, are referred to the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine, with the instructions that said committee inquire into the verity of said statements as to the hygienic conditions of the region between Colon and the city of Panama and in said cities, especially with reference to the regulation and control of labor on the canal proposed to be constructed across the Isthmus of Panama by the United States, namely:

The following extract from the report of the Isthmian Canal Commission of the 16th of November, 1901, on pages 170 and 171 thereof:

"The climate of the isthmian canal regions is generally damp and enervating. The temperature is not extreme, rarely rising as high as 95° or falling below 70°, but the excessive humidity greatly restricts the capacity for physical exertion. The lowlands near the coast have long been known as insalubrious, and the seaports are subject to fevers. Perhaps the greatest difficulty to be encountered in the construction of the canal will be the procurement of an adequate force of laborers and the preservation of their health and efficiency.

"In this respect the Panama route has a lugubrious history from which the Nicaragua route is free. The notorious mortality which attended the construction of the Panama Railroad and later the operation of the Panama Canal Company has taught a lesson which will not soon be forgotten for that route. Among the white employees of this Commission sent to Nicaragua there were fewer cases of sickness than there would probably have been among the same number of men employed in some parts of the United States. Among those sent to Panama the proportion of sickness was greater.

"On the Nicaragua line during the operations of the Maritime Canal Company the health of the force was reported to be good. These operations, however, were of a preliminary character, employing but a limited number of men. It is probable that when ten or twenty thousand men are assembled and the rank soil is being turned up over a widely developed line of works the experience will be different.

"There are some slight differences of climate. In Nicaragua the trade winds are more regular than at Panama, tempering the heat and removing miasma more effectively; but, on the other hand, the rainfall is greater at Nicaragua, at least for the east side, and the resulting humidity is greater. Both are covered with the rank vegetation peculiar to the Tropics, and swamps abound in both. The lessons taught at Panama should be heeded for Nicaragua also.

"It is stated by Mr. Bunau-Varilla, at one time chief engineer of the old Panama Canal Company, that out of 100 individuals sent to the Isthmus not more than 20, as an average, could remain there, and even these lost a part of their value. The negro alone could perform manual labor; the white man must supervise and direct. After costly and fatal experiments with other races the company ceased sending to the Isthmus as laborers any but native Colombians and negroes from the British Antilles, particularly Jamaica. The Panama Railroad Company grants to its white employees from the United States two months' leave of absence each year, with transportation to their homes.

"Careful selection, including physical examination, of persons sent to the Isthmus, a well-organized hospital service, an efficient sanitary supervision of camps and barracks, a rigid quarantine service, a liberal water supply and sewerage system, with the authority and the police force necessary to enforce the rules, and regular leaves of absence to white employees, are among the requirements for a successful prosecution of the work, and will probably be found necessary at either place."

And the following extract from Senate Document No. 48, being a part of the report of Consul-General Gudger to the Department of State, and incorporated in a report to Surgeon-General Lyman, dated November 23, 1903:

PANAMA.

Deaths in the city of Panama during the years 1901, 1902, and 1903.

Consul-General Gudger reports, November 23, to the Department of State as follows:

In obedience to a verbal request made by Surgeon-General Wyman, of the United States Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, while I was in Washington City a few weeks ago, I have the honor to transmit through the Department for him a report of the deaths and the diseases causing same in the city of Panama for the years 1901, 1902, and 1903.

[Inclosure.]

Synopsis of deaths occurring in the city of Panama during the years 1901 to 1903.

It will be remembered that during the period comprised in this report there has been in progress an internal war. The soldiers, many in number, sent from higher altitudes have died. This has greatly swelled the death rate.

Extract from the report of health officers to the Bureau of Marine-Hospital Service in June, 1901:

"PANAMA.

"The city of Panama, a town of 15,000 inhabitants, is situated upon an elevated point of land jutting into Panama Bay. The town is irregularly laid out, with narrow, crooked streets, cobblestoned, and filthy. The houses are Spanish in architecture in the least bad part of the city, and the rest of the town is made up of wooden shacks in all stages of decay. There are two small sewers in the place, but they are connected with only a few of the best houses. There is an insufficient water supply of inferior water, piped in from a river some distance back in the country.

"The population is a cosmopolitan set, the leavings of the old canal construction. Sixty per cent being Jamaica negroes accounts for most of the filth in the town.

"The harbor is situated at the head of the bay, about 2 miles from the town, and is protected by several small islands. The sanitary condition of the anchorage is naturally perfect, being swept by a 16-foot tide daily. The island nearest the shipping is inhabited by the employees of the steamship companies—laborers, stevedores, and coal passers.

"There is constant communication between this island and Panama, and daily intercourse with the shipping. Yellow fever is endemic in Panama, sporadic cases occurring at intervals, and becoming epidemic whenever there is an immigration of nonimmunes during favorable atmospheric conditions.

"Panama is the point of distribution and collection of all passengers and freight of the Pacific coast destined across the Isthmus. It is the key to the quarantine situation of the west coast, and if it was not a focus of infection itself many epidemics on the Atlantic side could be averted by proper quarantine regulations.

"The houses of Panama are so constructed and of such material and so filthy that a general conflagration would be the only safe means of disinfection. I can not conceive of any other means by which the infection could be eradicated.

"COLON.

"Colon, the northern terminus of the Panama Railroad, is built in a swamp on made ground, and is populated by 8,000 people, 70 per cent being Jamaica and other kinds of negroes. The property of the railroad and canal company is drained and sewered and is situated on the water front. Everything about the company's property looks clean and well kept, but the rest of the town is not so clean nor well kept.

"The houses are of wood and generally dirty. There are no sanitary arrangements of any kind, and the population is crowded into small rooms, as only Jamaica negroes can live.

"The streets are in fair condition, macadamized, and are on a higher plane than the adjoining lots. In the wet seasons pools are formed under the houses, and serve as breeding places for frogs, if nothing else. Rain water is collected in barrels and cisterns, and during the wet season the water supply is good and sufficient. During the dry season many of the cisterns run dry, and the water supply is hauled in from Monkey Hill in tank cars by the railroad. This supply is not good.

"No history of the sanitary condition or the mortality of Colon can be had. Some of the old inhabitants tell blood-curdling tales of the death rate during the flush days of the canal construction, but the old inhabitants will not do for statistical purposes. It was well known that the death rate was enormous, but it would be interesting to know just what it was."

And the statement of Merrill A. Teague, as follows:

"THE PROBLEM OF SECURING LABOR—COOLIES ARE OBNOXIOUS TO PANAMA'S CITIZENS AND WEST INDIANS ARE UNRELIABLE AS WORKERS.

[By Merrill A. Teague, special correspondent of the Advertiser.]

"COLON, December 29, 1903.

"If the American plans for an interoceanic canal offer no serious or forbidding engineering difficulties, there are other problems grave in character that we shall have to solve. Foremost among these is that of applying the laws of sanitation to the Isthmus and of forcing obedience to these laws. Of that problem I have already written exhaustively. The other most serious one deals with the question of labor.

"There has been, ever since the Republic was established, a very determined agitation against the importation of Chinese coolies for the canal work. The argument is advanced that the Isthmus and the West India islands can furnish all the labor necessary. This is, of course, fatuous. It does not, however, deter the leading spirits in the Republic from very vigorously insisting upon the passage at an early date of a Chinese exclusion act. The Star and Herald, official organs of the Republic, have demanded editorially the passage of such an act, and Doctor Amador is understood to strongly favor the proposition.

"This opposition is purely selfish. There is no labor on the Isthmus that would be deprived of opportunity through the presence of Chinese; there is no society here that would be contaminated more than contamination has already been spread by the coolies. They are, however, a serious menace to merchants, large and small. The French canal company brought coolie labor in large quantities to the Isthmus. Those that survived the pestilence which raged in those days have gone into business and so developed that they now control in a large measure both retail and wholesale vending at Panama, Colon, and between these two cities. Here in Colon they almost entirely monopolize the regular local trade, and at Panama they have come to be a powerful factor. In the 47 miles across the Isthmus their command upon trade is practically complete.

"The ability of these people to live cheaply is more pronounced here than it is in any other country outside of China. The item of clothing is almost entirely eliminated from their expense accounts. Here, as in China, they conduct their little 'pigeons' in the front of the buildings they occupy as residences. Fuel, except for small charcoal fires for cooking, is never required, and an able-bodied Chinaman can feed himself on the Isthmus at the expense of a few pennies a day. In consequence they can undersell any of the other merchants on the Isthmus, especially as they import largely and directly from China.

"These advantages, with that clannishness characteristic of the yellow race, strike terror to the hearts of the Caucasian merchants. They know that millions of dollars will be disbursed here in wages, to flow later through the regular channels of trade. They are afraid that if coolies are brought here to form a majority of the wage-earners they will patronize the Chinese merchants exclusively, thereby depriving local Caucasian merchants of the riches they hope to accumulate. This fear is, of course, well founded, but what alternative offers?

"WEST INDIANS POOR LABORERS.

"The Panamaians say the United States should employ native and West Indian negro labor. That sounds like a sensible proposition, but unfortunately the negative contention weighs down the affirmative. In the first place, the native labor, if such a thing can be said to exist, is absolutely worthless. The native laborer is lazy, shiftless, irresponsible, and generally of no account. Why should he toil in sun-baked or rain-flooded trenches for eight hours a day when he can live as well as he wishes to live by idling all the time, trapping his meat and going into the forest and jungle for vegetable supplies?

"That is a question the opponents of cooly labor do not answer. It is a question they can not answer, for the natives, during the score of years since the canal work was started, have answered it so effectively that none save the locally selfish longer consider the native element. Even if the natives' tendency was in the direction of good service in return for a fair wage, they could not be considered, for there are not enough of them available to constitute a small division of the immense corps of laborers that will be required to complete the canal within a reasonable time.

"As for the other plan—that of bringing West Indian negroes to the Isthmus—it is advanced without any intelligent idea as to its practicability. The stock argument used by its champions and the opponents of coolie importation is that these negroes stand the climate better than does any other class. That is true. During the period of active work by the French every class of labor known to large employers was called into service, and the West Indian negro proved more efficient and better adapted to the climate than did any other—that is, for a season. He did then, and will now, live longer on the Isthmus than will the Chinese, Maylayans, Africans, Syrians, or any other.

"For a little while he will work steadier and accomplish more than will the other classes, but his inherent shiftlessness soon overcomes him in this enervating climate, and he lapses into an idleness from which it is almost impossible to arouse him. Add to this the fact that he is naturally most immoral, courting rather than shunning the most loathsome afflictions, prone to debilitating excesses and especially fond of dedicating his nights to wild revelry and the worst carouses, and it will be seen that the temporary advantages resulting from his labor is more than offset by the harm he does himself and to society in general. The Isthmus has as many of these idle and improvident West Indians as it has any use for. To bring more would only increase the sociological problem that will sooner or later have to be solved.

"NEGROES NOT PROCURABLE.

"Besides this phase of the West Indian negro problem there is that one of securing this class of laborers. The former efforts to construct this canal resulted in a heavy depopulation of the West Indian Islands. Should we determine to use these negroes in our attempt we could easily exhaust those islands of able-bodied men. Their champions say they can be secured in limitless quantities. That is entirely false. When we have grappled with the task of building the canal and gotten it under full swing, we shall need almost innumerable thousands of laborers.

"The most optimistic estimates are that with 20,000 men we can complete the waterway in eight years. It is more reasonable to presume that 50,000 men will have it ready to open in ten years, for if there is one thing we must avoid, if we would succeed where the French failed, it is the undue optimism which cursed the whole French effort. Should we determine to prosecute the work steadily through every twenty-four hours of the day by using electric lights at night—a thing which, by the way, engineers and sanitary experts recommend—the time required for building the canal might be reduced one-half, but the corps of laborers required would be trebled in size.

"If we estimate the number in this corps by taking the mean of the estimates given, respectively, by the optimistic and the pessimistic, we shall probably hit about the figure fact will demonstrate as necessary. This will be 35,000 men, with constant recruits to fill the vacancies left by disease and death, with the forces working an eight-hour shift a day. One hundred thousand will be the number if the working day is divided into three eight-hour shifts. The West Indian Islands could not supply the smaller number, to say nothing of the larger.

"Only those West Indians to whom the wages offered would prove a magnet could be employed for this work; those who now earn more on their native islands than the canal contractors will pay could not be imported. Now, the standard rate of wages for ordinary manual labor on the Isthmus is $2.20 (Colombian silver) a day. It will probably never be any higher, for should the Republic fix an arbitrary rate of exchange at two for one, as is now proposed, this wage will be equal to $1.10 gold a day. Certainly the contractors on the canal will not pay more than this sum.

"Persons who have studied the problem of labor supply in the West Indies from the standpoint of the wage likely to be paid say that, even if the governments of these islands interpose no objection, it will not be possible to obtain more than 15,000 men from this source. That paucity of supply would seem to settle the West Indian negro as a factor in the labor to be required by the digging the canal, and conditions may be even worse than I have given them, for since the estimate of 15,000 men was made railroad construction in South and Central America has taken many hundreds, possibly thousands, of negroes from the West Indies, especially from Jamaica.

"How really serious this question is likely to become may be gathered from the fact that even now, with hordes of negroes on the Isthmus living in idleness, the Panama Railroad steamships are frequently compelled during rush seasons to stop at Fortune Island, halfway between Colon and New York, and take aboard hundreds of negroes to augment the stevedore gangs at this terminal.

"COOLY LABOR MOST PREFERRED.

"This brings the labor problem back to the Chinese cooly, as no other class is available in numbers sufficient to meet the requirements of the undertaking. The most intelligent and best-informed students of this problem agree almost unanimously in the judgment that before we shall have progressed very far in digging the canal we shall, no matter what our first intentions, be compelled to resort to the coolies. The Panamanian advocate of Chinese exclusion retorts that if we proceed upon this line disease will balk our effort, and points defiantly to the record under the French. Then the Chinamen died in appalling numbers, even in the higher and healthier sections of the work, and the village of Matachin—dead Chinaman—on the line of the railway, midway between this city and Panama, is a monument to death's wholesale depletion of the coolies' ranks.

"But the student has his rejoinder ready. The French displayed culpable ignorance in selecting Chinese for importation. They picked up the coolies wherever those willing to come here could be found, whereas little trouble would have been experienced had they gone—as our agents will do—into the Chinese rice fields, where coolies thoroughly inured to wet climates and accustomed to working more than knee-deep in water may be found in countless and inexhaustible numbers. This class of cooly labor would, it is contended, be immune to the Isthmian's climatic terrors, and by resorting to its employment the contractors under the United States would never be confronted or impeded by a scarcity of labor.

"There are, however, other advantages to result from the employment of this class of labor, equal in their importance with that of supply. The employment of coolies will be an almost positive guaranty against any delay in completing the canal because of wage and other ephemeral labor troubles. For the wage scale which will be paid on this work the Chinese cooly will labor industriously and earnestly. He will require careful management, and possibly some driving; but he will be satisfied with his remuneration, and the chances of strikes will be reduced to the minimum. This fact is to be carefully considered, for with thousands of laborers susceptible to wage agitation and long periods of idleness due to strikes made probable, the work would not only be greatly impeded, but the expense of it enormously increased; this latter because during strike periods violence would surely occur, anarchy be introduced on the Isthmus, and the cost of properly policing the canal zone and protecting the work done multiplied. Troubles of this nature would undoubtedly occur in case the labor employed is from the ranks of the West Indian negroes, or even of the negroes from our own country, for either is naturally a turbulent element, and for its turbulence there would be no lack of encouragement on the Isthmus during the flush times of active canal work.

"THE COOLY A STEADY WORKER.

"Another thing which inclines experts to favor the employment of coolies is their general tractability. It was the experience of the French that it was almost impossible to exercise control over other classes of laborers. The cooly works steadily, regularly, contentedly, and in his hours off, while an inveterate fantan player, is little addicted to boisterous living and excessive drinking. Exactly the reverse was found to be the case with other laborers during the period of French activity. The West Indian negroes were absolutely uncontrollable. They would work in their lazy, shiftless way, requiring the services of veritable taskmasters for overseers, and then in their hours off they would indulge in the wildest orgies.

"Night after night they would devote to dissipation in all the forms common on the Isthmus, gradually weakening their system until they were wholly unable to resist the approach of fatal disease. And then there were their regular seasons of idleness, during which all work stopped. The French practice was to pay on alternate Saturdays, and the major portion of the pay roll was computed on the basis of piecework. Early on Friday afternoon before pay day these negroes would invariably quit work and, in anticipation of receiving their biweekly wages, begin drinking. On Saturdays, when the money was handed over to them, there was no work at all.

"On Monday a few who had quickly exhausted their store of cash would straggle back to work. Tuesday a few more would appear, but not until Wednesday would the work be in full swing again, the intervening days having been spent by the great majority in drunken revelry, totally unfitting them to return even on Wednesday to render full and efficient service.

"No such difficulty as this, which we should have to expect with the West Indian negroes employed, would be experienced with cooly labor. The coolies place too much value on money and are naturally too provident to deplete their earnings on account of lost time.

"LABOR MUST BE DEPORTED.

"The last argument advanced by the champions of cooly labor is one we must not overlook. An immense population will be brought to the Isthmus and maintained here during the eight or ten years that will be covered by the construction work. When that work shall have been completed it will be necessary for us to reduce the local population by removing the greater number of these laborers. With the canal in operation the railroad traffic will drop to almost nothing, and there will be scant opportunity for any body of laborers, beside that the native population will be able to provide, to find employment. We must, therefore, contemplate the necessity of expatriating this labor after its usefulness has departed.

"Some of the laborers will, if West Indian negroes are employed, go into the wilderness, take up claims, and settle down to be self-supporting citizens of the Republic. Our experience with the greater number would, however, almost inevitably be the experience of the French—an experience which has crowded the line of the Isthmus with an idle, dissolute horde that contributes nothing whatever to the productivity of the country.

"Should coolies be employed we could make it a stipulation of the contracts under which they would be brought here that upon the completion of the canal the survivors should be returned to China; nor would we encounter any serious trouble or resistance from the coolies when it came to the task of deporting them. With the West Indian negroes deportation would be a practical impossibility, and the ultimate effect of their employment would be to burden the isthmian Republic with a population of no earthly account in the long run.

"Such are the general aspects of the labor problem as it will be presented by the ratification of the canal treaty. This problem we shall have to face the moment that treaty becomes operative and our interests assume a vested nature. The advantages to result from the employment of cooly labor are as positive as are the disadvantages that would follow the engagement of any other class of workers. The patent inability of our Government to use either Caucasian or negro laborers from the States on the actual work of excavation places the cooly proposition in a light entirely different from that in which it appears when the consideration is one of Chinamen going to the States.

"Without, therefore, in any way compromising the stand it has taken on the question of excluding the Chinese from our own country, our Government should sit down very hard upon the suggestion that this new Republic pass a Chinese-exclusion act. This might as well be done now as at any time, for even if we should start out with another idea, we shall sooner or later be driven to realization of the fact that the cooly alone can solve the labor problem, as it will appear in the construction of the canal."

And that said committee will consider and report such other facts relating to this inquiry that they may ascertain and may consider important and reliable.

And, in view of the provisions of the Hay-Varilla treaty, now pending in the Senate, that said committee will report to the Senate their conclusions and recommendations as to any measure that is necessary for the proper government of the canal zone proposed to be established by said treaty, and the region adjacent thereto, and any other part of the State of Panama, in respect of the improvement and future security of the health of said canal zone, and the persons to be employed therein by the United States, or by any contractor on said canal.

And that said committee consider and report especially as to such measures as the health and sanitary conditions of said canal zone as are necessary to provide for the regulation of immigration thereto, or the temporary residence therein, of persons whose presence there or in the country adjacent thereto, and in the cities of Panama and Colon, will endanger the health of the soldiers, marines, and seamen that it may be found necessary to employ in and about said canal zone; and what powers of government will be needed and will be adequate for the regulation or protection of intemperance, gambling, and violence, or other vices in said zone, and for the compulsory removal of persons engaged in or addicted to such violations of law and morals; and as are necessary to prevent their access to such canal zone, or to any place in the Republic of Panama where our military or police forces, or the laborers on the proposed canal may be employed in connection with its construction, or in connection with the Panama Railroad.

During the reading of the foregoing resolution,

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President, I suggest that the subject-matter of that resolution would carry it to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, but if there is any doubt about that question I should like to have the resolution lie over until the chairman of that committee is present.

Mr. MORGAN. The reading of the resolution has not been completed, Mr. President.

Mr. HOPKINS. I beg pardon of the Senator, I thought the reading had been concluded.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the resolution.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask that the resolution be printed and go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be printed and go over.

REPUBLICS OF NICARAGUA AND COSTA RICA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there further resolutions, concurrent or other? If not, the morning business is concluded, and the Chair lays before the Senate a resolution, to which he calls the attention of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

The SECRETARY. Senate concurrent resolution No. 32, submitted by Mr. MORGAN January 11, 1904, declaring it to be the duty of the United States to open negotiations with the Governments of Nicaragua and Costa Rica as required under the act of June 28, 1902, providing for the construction of an interoceanic canal.

Mr. MORGAN. That resolution, Mr. President, has been substituted by one of a later date, which has been referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I therefore withdraw the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is withdrawn.

RELATIONS WITH COLOMBIA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution submitted by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] on the 12th instant, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution 82, informing the President that the Senate favor and advise the negotiation of a treaty with the Republic of Colombia to satisfactorily determine and adjust all differences between the United States and Colombia growing out of the recent revolution in Panama, etc.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, by the courtesy of the Senate, on account of my necessary absence from the Chamber for some time past, that resolution has been permitted to lie upon the table subject, I understood, to my call. I desire to say that if my physical condition to-morrow shall permit, I will ask the leave of the Senate to address to it some remarks relative to the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the resolution lie on the table, subject to his call?

Mr. BACON. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

CORRESPONDENCE WITH COLOMBIA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution heretofore submitted by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. DANIEL on the 12th instant, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested, if in his opinion consistent with the public interest, to transmit to the Senate all correspondence between the Secretary of State and the representatives of the Government of Colombia which has taken place concerning our relations with that country since the revolution of November 4 in Panama and which has not been heretofore transmitted.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I desire to make some remarks on that resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina is recognized.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, it is my purpose in the remarks which I shall submit upon the pending resolutions to make a statement of the facts of this Panama situation as I see them and my conclusions drawn from those facts.

When the Fifty-seventh Congress met there was an apparently universal demand coming from all parts of the country for the construction of the canal by the Nicaraguan route. The national conventions of both parties had declared for that route. The Canal Commission had unanimously reported in its favor, and the alternative route by way of the Isthmus of Panama, on account of the exorbitant, if not impossible, price asked by the Panama Canal Company for its concessions, had, so far as the public mind and sentiment of the country were concerned, been eliminated from discussion and consideration.

In these conditions the Panama Canal Company, realizing that its only chance of selling its property on the Isthmus to this Government, its only possible purchaser, was about to be lost, reduced its demand from one hundred and nine to forty millions of dollars. Thereupon the Canal Commission was promptly reconvened and changed its recommendation from a unanimous report in favor of the Nicaragua to a unanimous report in favor of tLe Panama route.

As the result of this changed situation the old controversy between the two routes, which had slumbered for years, was revived and reopened, and the relative merits of the two routes again became the subject of earnest investigation and heated discussion. The discussion in this Chamber was long and exhaustive. Every phase of the question was debated. In consequence of this debate and the discussions through the press and by the people there occurred one of the most remarkable changes in public sentiment ever witnessed in this country. The Senate, following the recommendation of the Canal Commission, adopted the so-called Spooner Act, expressing its preference for the Panama route.

The House, which had already passed a bill authorizing the construction of the canal by the Nicaraguan route, reversed itself and followed the footsteps of the Senate, and the people acquiesced, as is shown by the fact that in States where the demand for the Nicaraguan route was once the strongest, notwithstanding their disapproval of the methods by which the Hay-Varilla treaty was made possible, the people are now demanding that that treaty shall be ratified.

I will not undertake to say what arguments, or reasons, or facts, in addition to the reduction by the canal company of its price, and the demonstrated feasibility of the Panama route, brought about this sudden and extraordinary change of opinion.

It may have been the fact that a canal by the Panama route may be made a sea-level canal, while a sea-level canal can never be constructed by the Nicaragua route.

It may have been the fact that it will require two nights and a whole day for a ship to pass through a canal at Nicaragua, while a ship can enter and pass out of a canal by the Panama route within the light of a single day. For the purpose of this statement and argument, suffice it to say that this change was not brought about by artifice or trickery, but that it was undoubtedly the result of a real change of opinion respecting the relative merits of these two routes.

In view, Mr. President, of these circumstances, in reaching a right conclusion as to the duties of the President under the Spooner Act, in locating the canal, the preference expressed in that act for the Panama over the Nicaragua route can not be considered as a mere perfunctory declaration by Congress or by the people. Undoubtedly the lawmakers by that declaration of preference meant more than simply to say to the President, as between the two routes, "While we somewhat prefer the Panama route, it does not matter much which you select so we get the canal, and get it quickly."

On the contrary, Mr. President, they meant to say to him, and to say it with unmistakable emphasis: "Panama is decidedly the best route. We have selected it after long and mature consideration. We therefore direct you to construct the canal by that route, if possible to acquire title thereto within reasonable time." The circumstances antecedent to and contemporaneous with this expression of preference show that it was intended that this preference should be treated as vital, the only condition of defeasance being the failure to acquire title in reasonable time.

Manifestly, Mr. President, by "reasonable time," as used in this act, is not meant the reasonable time of the court-house. That phrase when used in litigation, in civil controversies and transactions between man and man has to do with the recurring terms of the courts and must be interpreted in the light of the universal principle of swift justice and its corollary, a speedy trial.

The phrase "reasonable time" used in connection with this great transaction, which considered in relation to the great transactions of the world to-day is easily the greatest, the consummation of which after half a century negotiation is still in the future in which all civilized mankind are profoundly interested, must be interpreted in view of the supreme importance of the subject-matter and the slowness with which nations move in matters of such high import.

So interpreted, I can not believe there was such lapse of "reasonable time" as would have made it the President's duty to turn to the alternative route designated in the statute. I think that no one will contend that the President should have abandoned hope—broken off negotiations and gone to Nicaragua—while the Colombian Congress was yet in session and in any manner whatever considering the treaty, and this did not happen, as I understand, until the latter part of October.

But, putting aside and out of consideration the fact that a call had then been issued for an early extra session of Congress, and putting aside and out of consideration the President's claim that he thought, in view of this fact, it was his duty to wait and refer the whole matter back to Congress, the President knew, as everyone knew, that Colombia really and earnestly wanted the canal; that, if anything, she was more anxious that it should be constructed across the Isthmus instead of Nicaragua than we ourselves. He knew that the secret motive of Colombia's tortuous and dilatory diplomacy toward the treaty was directed to coercing the canal company into paying her for consenting to the sale of its concessions to this Government. He knew that the property of that company would become utterly worthless if the canal went elsewhere, and in these circumstances he might reasonably have concluded that mutual interest in the spoils would bring these traffickers together, and that either Colombia, with the canal and ten millions at stake, would abate her demand against the canal company or the canal company, rather than lose its only possible purchaser, would yield to the demands of Colombia, and that in this manner and within "reasonable time" the way might be made clear to give effect to the preference expressed in the Spooner law for the isthmian route.

But, Mr. President, let me return to the recital of the facts of the case.

Some time during the month of March, 1903, the President presented to the Senate a convention known as the Hay-Herran treaty, duly signed by the accredited representatives of this Government and Colombia, granting to the United States, on certain conditions and terms not inconsistent with the Spooner law, an easement to build a canal across the Isthmus. That convention was ratified by the Senate, although if all the Senators who voted for the Nicaraguan route had voted against it, it would have failed of the two-thirds vote necessary for ratification.

I assume that those Senators who preferred the Nicaraguan route voted to ratify the Hay-Herran treaty not because they liked it, not because its terms were satisfactory to them, for to many of them some of these terms were notoriously objectionable, but because they thought it was their duty to aid the President in carrying out the law and will of the majority as it was written in that law. This convention was rejected by Colombia and for that reason became inoperative.

The President now presents to the Senate another treaty, known as the Hay-Varilla treaty, accomplishing the same purpose as the one with Colombia, which has already been ratified by the other contracting party, and therefore only needs our ratification to make it effective. With this ratification the hostile interests both in this country and abroad which have so often circumvented our efforts to secure a canal in the past, which perhaps brought to naught our recent negotiations at Bogota; which, if they had had sufficient time and warning, might have defeated the negotiation which eventuated in the treaty now under consideration; which, should we repudiate this treaty and go to Nicaragua, might indefinitely delay and ultimately defeat our necessary negotiations with that country or Costa Rica, one or both; which sought, with sinister designs, to lure us to Nicaragua when we were about to go to Panama, and which now, should we start to Nicaragua, would with like motive seek to lure us back to Panama; which, in divers and sundry ways, through many and long years, have succeeded in confusing and dividing our councils and bringing to naught our negotiations for the construction of this great enterprise, will have finally met irretrievable defeat, and the last obstacle in the way of the accomplishment of the long-cherished aspirations of our people for a canal connecting the two oceans will have been removed.

Shall we refuse to ratify this treaty and enter again upon the long and weary struggle, with all its vexations, difficulties, and uncertainties?

Mr. President, I do not intend to discuss the provisions of this treaty. I am prohibited from doing that in open session of the Senate, but the treaty has been ordered published and I think it is not improper for me to say, generally, in passing that in nearly every way this treaty is much more favorable to the people of the United States than the one negotiated with Colombia and which we ratified, but which failed of ratification by the Congress of that country.

I have heard of no contention nor intimation that Panama did not have the legal right to make this treaty. Some question has been made about the authority of the President, under the Spooner Act, to make it on behalf of this Government, but none has been made, and, in my judgment, none can be made, to Panama's right in the premises, for when we recognized the independence of Panama, and shortly thereafter practically all of the other great nations of the world, including Nicaragua, her competitor for the canal, joined us in that recognition, whether that recognition was rightful or wrongful, whether in accordance with international law or in contravention of it, Panama became an independent and sovereign State, with all the rights and powers which sovereignty implies, including, of course, the treaty-making power.

But, Mr. President, the opponents of this treaty, admitting that it is highly favorable to us and that Panama is a free State possessed with full right to make it, still contend that it should not be ratified—first, because, they say, the President had no right under the Spooner Act to contract with Panama for the right of way across the Isthmus, the language of that law restricting his authority to negotiations for that purpose to Colombia; secondly, because, they say, the President unlawfully and in violation of our treaty obligations with Colombia incited and promoted the revolution in Panama, and recognized her independence in violation of the principles of international law.

Mr. President, I can not agree, in view of the present ownership by Panama of the territory to be acquired, with the contentions that the Spooner law does not confer upon the President full authority to acquire the right across the Isthmus from Panama. In the construction of every legislative act the intent of the lawmakers and the objects and purposes of the law furnish the rule for determining its meaning.

If it had been any part of the intention and purpose of the Spooner Act to indirectly confer a bounty upon Colombia by buying from her a "specific thing" at a greater price than its actual value, then the President undoubtedly would not have had, by virtue of the powers vested in him by this act, authority to buy that "specific thing" from another who had in the meantime succeeded to its ownership, because that would have contravened and defeated a material purpose of the law.

But it was no part of the purpose of the Spooner Act to confer a bounty upon Colombia; the sole object of that law was to authorize this Government to acquire the right of way to construct a canal across the Isthmus, and Colombia was named as the nation with which the President should negotiate for this right solely because at that time she was the owner of the territory over which we sought to acquire this right of way.

To deny to the President authority under this act to acquire this right of way from Panama, its present owner, would be to hold that the letter of the law respecting a nonessential is of more importance than its letter respecting its main object. It would be to defeat the main intention of the lawmakers, as well as the only object and purpose of the law itself. And in that event, Mr. President, who would be benefited; what object would be accomplished; what public policy would be promoted by this strained construction of that statute?

Surely we would not be benefited. Surely no policy of this country would be advanced, for we have declared our preference for the Panama route. Colombia would not be benefited, because she no longer owns the territory, and can not, therefore, cede it to us. The only effect, if this strained construction should prevail, would be to force the canal to Nicaragua, which would in turn defeat that provision of the act preferring Panama. Thus, in sticking to the letter of the law regarding a nonessential, not only the purpose, but one of the most important provisions of the law would be defeated.

If, however, the President had no authority to make this treaty under the Spooner Act, he unquestionably had that authority under his general power to negotiate treaties with foreign nations. Whether this treaty was made by the President under his general powers or by authority of the Spooner Act is immaterial, except as it affects the question of an appropriation to satisfy its money stipulations.

President McKinley, without legislative initiative, made the treaty of Paris, whereby Spain ceded to us the Philippine Islands for $20,000,000, and the appropriation was made afterwards. In this view it is simply a question of whether the appropriations provided in the Spooner Act would be available to satisfy the money stipulations of this treaty, and the doubt about that, if there be any, can be removed by amending that act by inserting Panama for Colombia wherever it appears.

I do not myself think there is any necessity for any amendment of that act. But to remove all possible question of doubt I had hoped that an amendment to this effect would be made before the vote on the treaty was taken, although I presume it would answer the purpose if done afterwards. I suppose such an amendment would meet with no serious opposition anywhere.

I do not think, therefore, Mr. President, that the Hay-Varilla treaty can be assailed on the ground of lack of power in the President to contract as he has contracted in this treaty with Panama. Neither do I think what the President may have done so far as present information discloses in connection with the revolution in or the recognition of Panama is sufficient reason, in law or in conscience, for the defeat of this treaty, otherwise altogether satisfactory.

I do not want nor do I intend to discuss this treaty from a partisan standpoint. The people have made the canal a nonpartisan question, and we should not drag it into politics.

On this side of the Chamber we have not made it a partisan question. We will vote on it according to our individual judgment. If it has been brought into politics at all, that has been done by the other side of this Chamber, which is solidly lined up in favor of it. Therefore the statement I am about to make I shall make in no partisan spirit, but simply as a statement of fact.

Mr. President, what has been done in Panama has been done, and it can not be undone. It was not done by the authority or under the auspices of the Democratic party, neither could that party have prevented its doing, and therefore it is in no way responsible for its doing. If what has been done in Panama can be undone at all by this Government, it can only be undone by doing a greater wrong to Panama than has already been done to Colombia. Surely in any event the defeat of this treaty will not either undo or remedy that wrong.

I am not here, Mr. President, to defend the actions of the President, either in connection with the revolution in or recognition of the independence of Panama. There is much in his conduct in these connections of which I wholly disapprove, which I regard as improvident and unwise; as rash and dangerous to the peace and welfare of this country; as contrary to the traditional policy of this Government in its dealings with other nations, especially those on this hemisphere, and as not calculated to advance us in the affections and esteem of other nations.

I do not think, however, that everything the President did in these connections was wrong. From the bottom of my heart I would be glad, for the honor of my country I would be glad, if I could reconcile all of his acts in these connections with my notions of right and law, but I can not and be honest with myself.

When the revolution was announced to the world, it seemed to me that the President, to use the expressive term of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], showed too much prevision, and I will add preparation for what that prevision enabled him to see would happen in Panama. But the President has assured us in a formal message to this Senate in the most emphatic manner that he did not, consciously and intentionally, in any way, direct or indirect, incite, encourage, or promote this revolution.

The fact, Mr. President, that as long ago as last August, when the Colombian Congress had begun to show an unfriendly disposition toward the treaty, there were mutterings of secession; that later, when it became apparent that the treaty would not be ratified, there were thinly veiled threats of separation uttered upon the very floors of the Colombian Congress, which later broke out into bold, open, and defiant threats of secession, both at Panama and at Bogota; the fact that there was at Panama, long anterior to the revolt, an organized band actively engaged in the organization of the insurrection; that these conspirators had, under the pretense of organizing a fire department, organized a military force of over 400 picked men in the city of Panama and arranged for the cooperation of the Colombian general and the forces under his command stationed in that city, as well as with the commander and the marines under him of one of the two Colombian gunboats then stationed in that harbor, tends to show that in their desperation the Isthmians, acting on their own initiative, had made up their minds to seek remedy for their wrongs in revolution.

It may be—in fact, it is almost certain—the Panaman conspirators knew what course this Government would pursue in the event of insurrection in the Isthmus and that they counted on that action to make their revolution successful. If they had such information—and, as I said, I think they did—I do not know how they obtained it, but I can see how it might have been acquired without the actual or guilty knowledge or complicity of either the President or the Secretaries of State, War, or the Navy.

Such secrets are notoriously hard to keep. The possession of this information should not, in my judgment, be accepted as contradicting or discrediting the positive statement of the President. In entire deference to the views of others on this side of the Chamber who may differ with me in this opinion, I think that the statement of the President in this respect should be accepted, and for myself I do accept it. Undoubtedly the President knew of the forthcoming revolution in Panama, and so knowing it was his duty, in view of the imminence of insurrection there, to have on the ground a sufficient force to protect the lives and property of American citizens.

This he did; and if he had done no more than this he would have done no more than his duty under the law or the treaty. But, Mr. President, that was not all that he did, or ordered to be done, if necessary to carry out the purpose of those orders. In specific terms he ordered the commanders of our naval forces, both at Colon and at Panama, to prevent the landing of troops, including the troops of Colombia, not only upon the transit and at its termini, but anywhere in the Isthmus of Panama.

I admit that under the guaranty of neutrality contained in the treaty of 1846 it was not only the right but the duty of this Government to prevent interference or hostile military operation by any foreign nation everywhere upon the Isthmus. But we did not have the right, Mr. President, in my judgment, under any rational construction of that treaty, to prevent Colombia from landing and occupying the Isthmus and its waters with its naval and military forces for the purpose of suppressing domestic disorders or subduing her refractory and rebellious subjects.

We had the right and it was our duty, under that clause of the treaty, to say to Colombia, in the event of insurrection in Panama, "You must so order and conduct your necessary military operations as not to actually interrupt or embarrass the transit across the Isthmus;" and that I believe is the extent of our right to interfere with military operations conducted by her in enforcing obedience to her laws and sovereignty. We did not have the right to say to her, "You shall not conduct hostile operations at all along the transit," for it is unreasonable to suppose that Colombia intended by that treaty, in any contingency whatever, to part with her right to maintain her sovereignty anywhere on the Isthmus.

Therefore I can not escape the conclusion that when the President directed the commanders of our naval forces to prevent the landing of troops, including Colombian troops, with hostile intentions upon any part of the Isthmus, or within 50 miles of the transit, he exceeded our rights under the treaty.

It is no answer to this position to say that the President merely gave orders to this effect, and that as a matter of fact no Colombian troops were prevented by these orders from landing on the Isthmus with the purpose of suppressing rebellion. These orders were received by the persons to whom they were sent, and undoubtedly measures were taken by them to carry them into effect in case of necessity.

The purport of these orders and the intention of the commanders of our forces at Colon and Panama with respect to them must have manifested itself and become a matter of common knowledge, both at Bogota and on the Isthmus; and the known purpose of this Government to prevent the landing of Colombian troops, in case such landing should be attempted, no doubt had the effect of overawing and preventing any attempt on the part of Colombia to take such measures as she had a right to take and would otherwise probably have taken to suppress the insurrection.

If Colombia was intimidated and deterred by these orders of the President or the known attitude of this Government in the premises from attempting to land her forces and from taking such measures as she had a right to take, the effect was the same as if she had been forcibly prevented by us from asserting her rights in this behalf. Such orders and the resulting attitude of our commanders there, whether so intended or not, was an unauthorized interference on our part with her sovereignty, if not an act of war.

I admit that the recognition of belligerency or independence is an Executive act, which has always, so far as I know, been left by us to the executive branch of the Government. And the fact that it may involve us in war with friendly nations interposes no objection to its exclusive exercise by the Chief Executive. I admit, also, that in granting recognition it has been our practice to be governed by considerations of public policy; that is, that we have made our recognitions speedy, or we have procrastinated, as the one or the other course of action has been thought by us to be conducive to our national interest.

But whether our recognition has been hasty or tardy we have, always, heretofore, regarded it as a condition precedent to recognition that there should be a government, de facto at least, reasonably capable of maintaining itself.

The President in his message seems to admit this principle of international law, but he contends that Panama, on account of our treaty rights and duties and because he conceives that in the matter of the construction of a canal connecting the two oceans we have received a mandate from collective civilization, that Panama is excepted from its application.

This is a plea in confession and avoidance which, in my judgment, can not be admitted, but which when taken in connection with the statement in the President's message to the effect that when the Colombian Congress adjourned without ratifying the treaty, and before the revolution occurred in Panama, he was considering referring the whole matter to Congress for instruction whether he should proceed to construct the canal across the Isthmus without further authority from Colombia, shows not only an excess of zeal on his part for the canal, but a painful disregard of the rights of other nations.

I am bound to say, and I have no pleasure in saying it, that the course of the President, both in connection with the revolution in Panama and the recognition of its independence, was, to say the least, hasty, rash, improvident, and dangerous to the peace and welfare of this country, and justifies the feeling of many of his political friends as well as his political opponents that he lacks that conservatism which considerations of national stability and safety make necessary and desirable in the Chief Executive of the nation.

Mr. President, it is contended and vehemently asserted by some of the opponents of this treaty that a vote for its ratification is, under the circumstances, tantamount to condoning the action of the Administration, both as to the revolution and to the recognition. If I thought that, as favorable as I regard this treaty, as deeply important to us as is the immediate construction of the canal, and as vexatious as I am sure will be the delays in the commencement of that great work if this treaty should be defeated, I do not think I could vote for it.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PETTUS in the chair). Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from North Carolina is too good a lawyer, I judge, not to know that it is good law that the receiver of stolen goods is as guilty as the man who steals them.

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, I do not think the President has stolen anything over there. I do not think there is any question of stolen goods and thievery involved in this matter.

Mr. President, as I was about to say when interrupted by the Senator from South Carolina, if Senators, however much they desire the canal, believe that that will be the effect of a vote for this treaty, while I dissent from that conclusion, I can not and will not criticise their opposition to it and their refusal to support it.

To my mind, Mr. President, the revolution in and the recognition of Panama and the ratification of the treaty with Panama as an independent State are two separate and distinct propositions. And I think to refuse to ratify the treaty because we can not approve of the way in which Panama acquired her independence, would be to unnecessarily confuse these two separate propositions. Josh Billings said: "I never argue against a success." The great humorist probably only meant by this saying to emphasize the truth that it is hard to argue against a success.

Mr. President, if it is hard to argue against success, it is impossible to argue against a fact. You may deal effectively, you may even punish the agents and instrumentalities which have brought a fact into existence, but you can do nothing with the fact itself except to recognize it. No amount of disapproval, criticism or denunciation will destroy it or modify its existence as a subsisting thing.

I join my colleagues on this side of the Chamber in condemning whatever wrong the President and the Administration may have done in connection with bringing about the independence of Panama, but in my vote upon the treaty I propose to recognize and act upon the fact that Panama is an independent State, possessed of equal rights and powers to make this treaty as we ourselves possess, not only with our consent, but the practically unanimous consent of all the civilized nations of the world.

I do not suppose that many Democrats approved of the action of this Government in connection with the revolution and annexation of Hawaii. The charges made against the action in this matter of the Administration then in power were not far different from those now made against the President.

Surely it can not be said that those Democrats who voted to give Hawaii representation in the House of Representatives, and those who have before and since voted for laws to give to the people of that island good government and administration, by those votes condoned the wrongful and illegal acts of this Government which led to and made successful that revolution and annexation. Certain it is they did not intend by those votes to condone these things, but only to recognize a subsisting fact and act upon it.

The same is true with reference to the acts of the Administration toward the Philippine Islands after we had wrested that country from the dominion of Spain. It was then said that we had used the power of the Army to take from these people, whom we had found fighting for country and liberty, not only their country, but their freedom, and that, too, in violation of our plighted faith to them and of the essential principles of our own Constitution, and that when they resisted we had forced them to submit at the point of the bayonet and the mouth of the cannon.

I confess that I felt this way about that business myself; but can it be said that those Democrats, who a few days ago voted for Mr. Luke Wright to be governor of the Philippine Islands, by that act condoned those acts of spoliations, usurpations, and outrages against the Constitution of our fathers and the laws of civilization? Certainly they did not intend to do any such thing. They intended only to recognize an accomplished fact and to make the best of it, and that is all that vote or any other vote to give to the people of those islands good laws and administration means.

The people of the South voted for the thirteenth, fourteenth, and sixteenth amendments to the Constitution of the United States, but they did not mean by those votes to indorse the war that had been waged against the South to prevent her withdrawing, as they thought she had a right to do, peacefully from the Union. They did not mean to indorse the forcible abolition of slavery. They simply recognized the fact that the sword had forever put an end to the right of slavery and secession in this country and to act upon these facts without approving the way in which they had been brought about.

Mr. President, to my mind, you might as well say that I can not administer on the estate of a dead man without approving of his death as to say that I can not act upon the admitted fact that Panama is an independent nation without approving of the means by which that independence was achieved.

Mr. President, I can not find it in my heart to blame the Panamaians for seceding from Colombia. If oppression, if tyranny, if despotism ever justified revolutions, they were justified in revolution. They were bound to a State which had never felt or shown any interest in them or in their welfare. They were forced to pay ruinous taxes with only nominal representation, without receiving in return any of the benefits of taxation in government or administration, in public improvements or in the education of the people.

The canal was their only hope for relief from the miserable and wretched conditions to which Colombia's greed and tyranny had reduced them, and even that the Government at Bogota denied them.

Perhaps their aspirations for freedom were wrong, but our forefathers under like conditions did not think so. Perhaps they should have submitted supinely to oppression, but our forefathers under similar conditions struck for liberty and with the help of France achieved it.

On the other hand, Mr. President, I can not enthuse over the alleged wrongs of Colombia. The treaty we made with her was of her own seeking. It was signed by her authorized agents, with full knowledge of its contents. It provided for the construction upon her own territory of the greatest work of internal and international improvement and development ever essayed by man.

By duplicity and treachery she defeated that treaty, not because she did not want the canal, and would not have gladly taken it upon the terms provided therein, but because she wanted in an indirect way to extort more money from us or the Panama Canal Company, or perhaps from both.

Her treachery toward Panama and toward us in this canal matter illustrates both her traditional policy toward Panama and her standard of diplomacy. In all of her history I know of nothing to excite the admiration of any humane man or any patriotic liberty-loving American citizen.

Mr. President, when I consider the wrongs Colombia has perpetrated against Panama, and when I consider this last great act of indifference to the welfare of that long-suffering people, the conclusion forces itself upon me that when Colombia lost the canal, when Panama succeeded in establishing her independence, the eternal principles of right and righteousness once again prevailed.

Mr. President, I shall vote for these several resolutions of inquiry, the general purpose of which is to place the Senate in possession of the same information when it votes upon the ratification of the treaty that the President had when he made the treaty. That is right. The construction of the canal is a matter of the greatest importance to all of our people. It is of supreme importance to the section from which I come.

The people of the State which I in part represent feel deeply concerned, not only in having the canal, but in securing it as speedily as possible. They are impatient of delays; they want to see negotiations ended and the work begun. They preferred the Nicaraguan route, but they do not think that the defeat of this treaty makes the canal at Nicaragua, either in the near or remote future, at all certain.

They see in its defeat only vexatious delays, dangerous procrastinations, and perhaps the ultimate defeat of their hopes. They do not wish to see this great enterprise become the football of partisan politics. They wish me to vote for this treaty if I can do so without violating my conscience. If for reasons of conscience I can not vote for it they will be sorely disappointed, but they will not condemn me.

I shall wait for the forthcoming of the information asked for in the pending resolutions. I shall hold my mind open until all the facts are laid before us. If they shall disclose a condition of things which, in my judgment, would make the ratification of this treaty improper or make it impossible for me to vote for it without doing violence to my conscience, I will not vote for it.

Mr. President, while, as I have tried to make plain, I have no sympathy with Colombia, I think she has suffered wrong at our hands, and I trust that some proper way may be found to compensate her in some way as far as it is possible for us to compensate her for these wrongs, and that the outcome of all this matter may be the speedy construction of the canal upon terms, not only satisfactory to us and to Panama, but reasonably so to Colombia; and I am glad the Democratic party has taken the initiative in bringing before Congress measures looking to that end.

REVOLUTION IN PANAMA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution 84, by Mr. STONE, directing the Committee on Foreign Relations to ascertain whether Bunau-Varilla and others residing in the United States, etc., did aid an insurrection in Panama against the Republic of Colombia.

Mr. SPOONER. I move the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. GORMAN. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] is absent at this moment.

Mr. SPOONER. I have, of course, no desire to press the motion in his absence.

Mr. GORMAN. I trust the motion will not be pressed. The purport of the resolution is to require the Committee on Foreign Relations to make this investigation. The reasons therefor were very ably presented by the Senator from Missouri who offered the resolution. It is a matter which it strikes me must be determined by the Senate.

Mr. SPOONER. Is this the same resolution? I did not so understand it.

Mr. GORMAN. It is the Stone resolution, directing the Committee on Foreign Relations to make the investigation.

Mr. SPOONER. The resolution on which the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] addressed the Senate yesterday I understood went to the table subject to his call later.

Mr. GORMAN. I may be wrong, but I ask the Secretary to kindly read the resolution and let us see what it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the resolution which the Senator from Missouri modified yesterday.

Mr. SPOONER. I did not so understand it as it was stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The original proposition of the Senator from Missouri was that it might lie on the table subject to his call. Then the docket shows, "January 26, modified," and it shows nothing further. Perhaps a fair construction would be that the modified resolution shall lie on the table subject to his call.

Mr. GORMAN. I trust it may be so considered.

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly. I did not suppose it was the same resolution.

Mr. GORMAN. It is the same resolution.

Mr. SPOONER. I remember the Senator from Missouri asked that it might lie on the table subject to his call.

Mr. GORMAN. That was the original resolution, but I trust that the Chair will hold that the same order applies to the modified resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will consider that the resolution lies on the table subject to the call of the Senator from Missouri. Does the Senator from Wisconsin withdraw the motion to refer?

Mr. SPOONER. My motion can go with it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes; the motion can go with the resolution.

SAFETY APPLIANCES ON RAILROADS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A resolution by Mr. PATTERSON, calling on the Interstate Commerce Commission to send to the Senate copies of all petitions, etc., received relative to relieving common carriers by railroad from any of the provisions of safety-appliance acts, etc.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, I have an understanding with one or two Senators that I would not call up the resolution unless they were here. Neither of the Senators to whom I made the promise is present. So I hope the resolution will go to the Calendar, subject to call by me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator means that it shall go to the table subject to his call?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes; let it go to the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Colorado that the resolution shall lie on the table subject to his call? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

RELATIONS WITH COLOMBIA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution No. 88, by Mr. HALE, requesting the President to tender his best offices toward the adjustment of differences between Colombia and Panama.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This was to accompany the resolution offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] and is supposed to be offered as a substitute for it. The Senator from Georgia yesterday had his resolution laid on the table subject to call. If there be no objection the resolution will be regarded by the Chair as laid on the table, subject to call.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT INVESTIGATION.

Mr. GORMAN. I request that all of the resolutions relating to the investigation of the Post-Office Department may be taken up and referred. We have agreed on all sides (and I understand that no further debate is desired in the Senate on them) that they shall be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They have all been referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, together with the pending amendments.

Mr. GORMAN. I am very glad to hear it. I was not aware of it.

PAWNEE INDIAN SCHOOL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution 93, by Mr. CARMACK, directing the Secretary of the Interior to transmit to the Senate the originals or copies of all charges, etc., relating to the superintendent and other employees of the Pawnee Indian School.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution, submitted by Mr. CARMACK on the 15th instant, was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, directed to transmit forthwith to the Senate the originals or copies of all charges, reports, and other documents on file in his Department relating to the superintendent and other employees of the Pawnee Indian School, Pawnee, Okla., together with such other information as will show the action of his Department in relation to such superintendent during the twelve months last past.

RELATIONS WITH NEW GRANADA OR COLOMBIA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution 102, by Mr. NEWLANDS, requesting the President to negotiate a new treaty with the United States of Colombia providing for the cession of all rights it may claim to have in connection with the Isthmus of Panama or the treaty of 1846.

Mr. GORMAN. I ask that this resolution may go over also.

Mr. SPOONER. Let it go over, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland asks unanimous consent that the resolution shall go over without prejudice. The Chair hears no objection.

DIPLOMATIC CORRESPONDENCE RELATIVE TO PANAMA, ETC.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution 104, by Mr. CULBERSON, requesting the President to inform the Senate whether all the correspondence, etc., between the Department of State and the legation of the United States at Bogota, etc., has been sent to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], as he was to be necessarily absent from the Chamber, asked the Chair that this resolution might go over without prejudice.

Mr. GORMAN. Subject to his call?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; that it shall remain on the table without prejudice. That would leave it in its present condition.

Mr. TILLMAN. To come up in the morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

MEMORIAL OF BATTLE AT POINT PLEASANT, W. VA.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask unanimous consent to have taken up out of its order the bill (S. 792) to authorize the erection of a monument at Point Pleasant, W. Va., to commemorate the battle of the Revolution fought at that point between the colonial troops and Indians October 10, 1774.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read to the Senate in full for its information.

The SECRETARY. The Committee on the Library report to amend the bill by striking out all after the enacting clause and substituting the following:

That the sum of $10,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, to aid in the erection and completion of a monument or memorial at Point Pleasant, West Virginia, to commemorate the battle of the Revolution fought at that point between the colonial troops and Indians October 10, 1774: Provided, That no part of said appropriation shall be expended until the site and plans for said monument or memorial shall be approved by the Secretary of War, and the grounds on which said monument or memorial is to be located shall be dedicated to the use of the public, and provision is made for opening and maintaining an open highway thereto.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to aid in the erection of a monument or memorial at Point Pleasant, West Virginia, to commemorate the battle of the Revolution fought at that point between the colonial troops and Indians October 10, 1774."

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

An act (S. 1496) supplemental to the act of February 9, 1821, incorporating the Columbian College in the District of Columbia, and the acts amendatory thereof.

The message also announced that the President of the United States had on the 25th instant approved and signed the following acts and joint resolution:

An act (S. 465) to amend an act entitled "An act to permit the Pintsch Compressing Company to lay pipes in certain streets in the city of Washington," approved May 19, 1896;

An act (S. 652) making Chester, Pa., a subport of entry; and

A joint resolution (S. R. 31) authorizing the erection and maintenance of a monument in memory of the late President Benjamin Harrison, upon land owned by the United States in the city of Indianapolis, State of Indiana.

The message further announced that the President of the United States had on this day approved the joint resolution (S. R. 32) to fill vacancies in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution.

ALASKA SALMON COMMISSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and referred to the Committee on Fisheries, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication from the Secretary of Commerce and Labor submitting a preliminary report of the Alaska Salmon Commission, appointed in accordance with the instructions in my letter of November 8, 1902.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

WHITE HOUSE, January 27, 1904.

NOTE.—The report accompanied a similar message to the House of Representatives.

A. R. CRUZEN.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate:

In response to the resolution of the Senate of January 18, 1904, requesting the President, "if not in his opinion incompatible with the public interest, to inform the Senate whether any report has been made to the Treasury Department by L. Cullom, special agent of the Treasury, with respect to the conduct of A. R. Cruzen, collector of customs in Porto Rico, and if so, to transmit the same to the Senate with a statement of what action, if any, has been taken thereon," I send herewith the accompanying letter from the Secretary of the Treasury. For the reasons therein given I deem it incompatible with the public interest to forward the report by the special agent of the Treasury in question.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

WHITE HOUSE, January 27, 1904.

Mr. BATE. My colleague [Mr. CARMACK], who offered the resolution, is not in the Chamber. I do not know what disposition he would desire to have made of the message. He was here a minute ago. I have sent for him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The message will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. BATE. Very well.

NATIONAL APPALACHIAN FOREST RESERVE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the Calendar of General Orders.

The bill (S. 887) for the purchase of a national forest reserve in the Southern Appalachian Mountains, to be known as the "National Appalachian Forest Reserve," was announced as first in order on the Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator in charge of that bill is absent, and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] also specially requested that it should be passed over without losing its place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Missouri, that the bill be passed over for the present without prejudice? The Chair hears none.

RELIEF OF CERTAIN SETTLERS.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 278.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us go on with the Calendar regularly for a little while and then we can take up that bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. I hope the Senator will not object to my request. After this bill is passed I shall consent to the course he suggests. A similar bill has passed the Senate two or three times heretofore.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us see what it is.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 278) to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands, and to provide for the repayment of certain fees, purchase money, and commissions paid on void entries of public lands."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read to the Senate in full.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have been advised by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY], who is a member of the Committee on Public Lands, that he would like to look into the bill. I supposed the report was unanimous, but he tells me he was not present when it was considered, so I ask that the bill may go over.

Mr. SPOONER. Is there a printed report?

Mr. MITCHELL. There is.

Mr. SPOONER. It is not in my file.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over without prejudice.

Mr. MITCHELL. Without prejudice.

RELIEF OF CERTAIN DESERT-LAND ENTRYMEN.

The bill (S. 147) for the relief of persons who made the first payment for desert lands under the act of March 3, 1877, but who were unable to perfect entry thereof, was announced as next in order, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill was considered yesterday, and is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, I wish to move an amendment to the bill. On page 2 of the bill, line 1, after the word "thereof," I move to insert the words "where the claim has not been assigned." Further along I move to strike out, in line 3, the words "or assigns," and to strike out, beginning after the word "aforesaid," in line 5, down to line 8, including the word "repayment," and also to strike out the second proviso, beginning in line 11.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas moves an amendment which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 1, after the word "thereof," insert the words "where the claim has not been assigned."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, while I agree with what I think the Senator from Arkansas wishes to accomplish—i. e., avoid paying fraudulent claims—yet I want to call his attention to one feature of the case.

The original act, in contradistinction, perhaps, with others, seemed to be based upon the expectation of assignment in many cases, and the equity in such cases is often with the assignee. I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that none of these claims will be paid unless the Department is satisfied that they are legal and proper, and, of course, they have proofs as to every case on file in the Department.

Take a case where an assignment was properly made. The party has proceeded under it and expended his money, but is debarred from title on account of something beyond his control. Then I assume the Senator would not care that such an assignee, who proceeded in good faith, should lose his money just from the bare fact that he was an assignee, and properly so, under the law.

All these entries and proofs offered are matters of record. Not a case has been refused by the land offices without assigning the reasons therefor.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, the bill, as I stated yesterday, is not in its entirety a bill that I think appeals very strongly to either the sense of justice or equity which ought to control the Senate. Nevertheless, I would not have so much objection to refunding to the original entryman or his heirs, where he is dead, who had made no assignment, who had been prevented, and without fraud on his part, from consummating his entry. I would have no special objection to the money that he paid into the Treasury, 25 cents per acre, being refunded to him or to his heirs. But where he made an assignment, he, of course, can have no claim, because the assignee no doubt paid him the amount of 25 cents an acre and in many cases perhaps more than that. Therefore, he could have no claim whatever where he had assigned the claim.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator from Arkansas allow me a moment?

Mr. BERRY. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Arkansas to the fact that neither the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands [Mr. HANSBROUGH] nor the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK], also a member of the committee who reported this bill, is present. It seems to me that the measure ought not to be proceeded with in their absence. I submit it to the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. BERRY. I will say to the Senator that the bill was discussed something like an hour yesterday, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], who sits on my right, seeming to be in charge of the bill. If anyone desires, the bill may go over. It has come up on regular call. I am not pressing the matter. But I would like to conclude what I was saying and then the Senate can take such action as it chooses. I have not called it up. It came up in regular order. The Senator from Wyoming made no objection on account of the absence of his colleague, and, of course, I could not object.

Mr. President, I have already stated that where the original entryman made an assignment he could have, of course, no claim, because he was paid back his money by the party to whom he assigned.

Now, where some one else purchased his right, went into the market, made the contract with him, he certainly can have no claim against this Government. He bought the land from the other party upon the theory that it would pay him to buy it and that it was a matter to his interest. If he failed in that, if he was mistaken, if he was unable from any cause to carry out the provisions of the law and make the balance of the payments, certainly the assignee, I think, has no claim, either legal or equitable, against the Government that it should be paid back to him.

If the amendments I have offered prevail, then the bill will simply stand that where the original entryman made this entry, paid the Government 25 cents an acre, and was unable to carry out the provisions of the law, and there was no fraud or unlawful act upon his part, then, under the bill, he shall receive back his money. But I insist that the assignee has no kind of claim against this Government. He purchased it on speculation from the original entryman. If his speculation failed, he can not claim that it is the duty of the Government to pay him back money that he had never paid to the Government, but which he paid to another individual.

Now, that seems clear to my mind. I would not, as was charged by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] yesterday, do the settlers in the West, or in any other part of this country, an injustice if I knew it, but it does seem utterly unreasonable that these assignees should be paid. How many of these claims they have collected, from whom they have purchased, or in whose hands they are I do not know; nor is it shown here how many of these claims there are, or probably will be, except by a general statement.

I insist, therefore, that before this bill is passed, if it is to be passed, it ought to be amended as I have suggested.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] yesterday said a great deal about these entries, and the hardships, etc., of settlers. He said something, in reply to what I had said, about men of wealth and corporations and combinations procuring others to take up lands and that then they would get the benefit of them. I am told, and the Secretary of the Interior so stated in his report a year ago, if not in the last, that thousands of acres have been procured in that way, by inducing persons to enter under the desert-land act, where there was never an attempt made even to put water upon the land; and in many cases individual cattle and sheep holders to-day own thousands of acres of land, procuring title from the Government, when the law was never complied with, and there was never any water put on the land, as the law required.

Of course those parties do not come under this bill, because they have title to the land, but I make this statement in answer to much that has been said by the Senator from Colorado. To-day the Secretary of the Interior says that the frauds which have been perpetrated in some of the Western States under the desert-land act, under the timber and stone act, and under the commutation clause of the homestead act are perfectly appalling.

The Senator from Montana [Mr. GIBSON], who made a report in favor of the repeal of these laws during the last Congress, recites case after case where lands have been procured from this Government by the means which I have named, and where thousands of acres are held by single individuals or by corporations, upon which they are grazing sheep and cattle to-day, and the provisions of the desert-land act have never been complied with in a great many hundreds of those cases.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I move that the pending bill with the amendments be referred to the Committee on Public Lands. I make this motion for the reason, mainly, that I am unwilling to vote for a measure involving an appropriation of a million dollars possibly, but of a quarter of a million dollars anyway, without some report from the Department of the Government which is charged with the administration of the affairs out of which the liability grows. I think this bill should be accompanied by a report of the Secretary of the Interior, and it should doubtless also be accompanied by a report from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, a very able man, who comes from the far West and who has had experience and observation of the class of cases which are covered by this bill. There is more than one class of cases covered by it.

How many Senators here know anything about what this bill carries in the way of appropriations or the distinction in merit between the two classes of cases, or the three or four classes; between language which will protect a man who, perhaps we all might say, ought to be protected and the speculator, the trafficker? I have listened to the debate and I can not tell, though it may be because of my dullness.

I now make this motion, and I shall generally make it in matters of this kind. I think such bills, where they involve anything of consequence, ought to go to the proper Department for report to the Senate, so that we shall have the Government's side of the matter as well as the claimants' side of the matter.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I do not wish to antagonize the motion made by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], but I feel moved to say a word in connection with what the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] has stated about confusion in the land laws.

The Senator, either purposely or not, has seemed to convey the idea that it was the desert-land law under which most of the fraudulent entries have been made and fraudulent practices had arisen. I think he will find, if he will reexamine the report of the Secretary of the Interior, to which he refers, that the same complaint is made as to all the land laws.

Mr. BERRY. I so stated, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. WARREN. Very well. If the Senator so stated, as he says he did, what is he going to do about it? Is he going to say, because there have been some fraudulent proofs, and because there have been abuses of the law, that all of the land laws have been failures?

I should like to have him look for a moment at the country which is covered through the reclamation service under the desert-land law, see what it was before the desert-land law was passed and what it is now, and see what it has since contributed to the wealth of this nation. I contend that there is no law upon the statute book, aside from the original homestead law itself, which, as a whole, has been of as much benefit to this nation as the desert-land law. I know in my State and in the States of Idaho, Utah, Colorado, and others there would hardly have been enough reclaimed land to support one county in each State, perhaps, had it not been for this law. I know, and the Senator from Arkansas should know, the great progress there has been because of the operation of the desert-land law.

Now, as to the assignments, I will admit all the Senator says as to really fraudulent assignments. But there have been many other cases. For instance, I recall a town where there are probably fifteen hundred persons now living, a happy community. How came they there? Not many years ago it was as desolate a piece of land as existed in the State. There were a few public-spirited men who knew that water enough passed by it and that a large amount of money expended there would render available enough water to make that a large and valuable settlement. Half a dozen men clubbed together in the first instance, and later on a greater number contributed. Their own rights had been previously exhausted by desert-land claims, but there were others, some of whom wished to take desert-land claims, to go along with this aggregation, this association, and prove up upon their individual claims. There were still others who were willing to use their claim rights for the association, because they were living in the East and did not want to live upon the land, but were willing to help reclaim the waste places, and under the law they had the right to assign to somebody who could step into their places and go on. The men who went into it and entered first, six of them, expended from $30,000 to $50,000 apiece, which they have never since seen. Others expended smaller sums in trying to carry out the scheme of making the desert bloom and of locating there a happy colony.

Orders of the Department relating to proofs under the desert-land laws underwent so many changes that the original capital put in was all wiped out. The settlers had to go back and start anew.

Fortunately changes occurred which again brought the Department to a more liberal view of the matter. So we have there to-day some 75,000 acres of land under intense cultivation, producing great crops, cultivated by happy people; and yet, back of it all lies the wreck and ruin of several men—for the money they had invested was invested in just as good faith as though they had succeeded—because the Government, under various officials and orders, made it impossible for them to prove up.

Now, the suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas is to reimburse the original entry fee. That is good so far as it goes; but there are a very great many of the assignees who should be treated with the same degree of liberality, because they were able to expend, and did expend at the time, much larger amounts of money than the usual first settlers could or would expend.

As to the matter of the recommitment of this bill, I am perfectly willing that it shall be recommitted, for this bill has not been sneaked in here against the wish and knowledge of the Interior Department. The Department was consulted regarding it, as were the members of the committee who have had it in charge. I have not the slightest objection to its recommitment for the purpose mentioned, although of course it will delay its passage and perhaps conduce to its defeat by reason of delay only. A precisely similar bill has been passed here three times while the same Senators who are now opposing it were members of this body. I also regret that it should not have had the earlier attention of the Senator from Arkansas, who is a member of the Committee on Public Lands, because that committee has favorably reported it three or more times, and never adversely.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to inquire if the report of this bill has ever been accompanied by a report from the Interior Department?

Mr. WARREN. I think the report which is now before us is the only one that has come from the committee.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, I will say, in answer to the Senator from Wisconsin, that the matter was discussed in the Committee on Public Lands this morning. The clerk of the committee did not have time to make a very careful examination, but he stated that there was nothing on file with the committee to show that the Interior Department had ever made any report upon this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], to recommit the bill, with the pending amendments, to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

W. J. KOUNTZ.

The bill (S. 421) for the relief of W. J. Kountz was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to W. J. Kountz, his heirs or legal representatives, $12,487.14, that being the amount found due him by the Third Auditor, and approved by the Second Comptroller of the Treasury, on vouchers properly presented and on file, for services actually rendered by him in transporting troops and supplies on the Yellowstone River, under a contract dated March 12, 1878, between W. J. Kountz and the Quartermaster's Department of the United States Army, at St. Paul, Minn., but which was withheld by the accounting officers of the Government pending a suit by the United States to recover from said Kountz $22,845.51, from the payment of which sum he was released and discharged by act of Congress of February 19, 1895, and the order of the Secretary of War of March 24, 1897, carrying the act of Congress into effect.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SADIE THOME.

The bill (S. 1585) for the relief of Sadie Thome was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, it strikes me that this bill is not in very good form. It has a preamble that can not be stricken out and leave the bill perfect in itself, and so I offer what I send to the desk as a substitute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment in the nature of a substitute submitted by the Senator from New Hampshire will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Sadie Thome, the widow of S. W. Thome, late consul of the United States at Asuncion, Paraguay, South America, who died at his post of duty on the 19th day of March, 1897, the sum of $1,500, being the amount of salary for one year.

Mr. COCKRELL. That does not relieve it. The only way to relieve it is to let the bill be passed and then to strike out the preamble.

Mr. GALLINGER. That would not leave a perfect bill, I will say to the Senator, as he will see if he will read it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then the Senator proposes to leave the preamble stand? When the Senator's substitute is agreed to the preamble will still be in the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; but I shall move to strike that out later on.

Mr. COCKRELL. All right.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I want to say a word about this bill. I am not certain that I am opposed to it, and I dislike to say a word which seems adverse to a bill which proposes to give money to the widow of a consular officer; but is it to become the rule that whenever a consul or an officer of the United States dies in a foreign land in the diplomatic service at his post of duty his widow is to be given a year's salary? I want to ask the Senator who reported this bill if that is regarded by the committee as a proper rule to adopt in all cases, or whether there is some peculiarity about this case which would make it fairly an exception to the rule?

Mr. KEAN. For the information of the Senator, I will state that the Committee on Foreign Relations thought there was a peculiarity about this case, and they therefore ordered it to be reported favorably.

Mr. SPOONER. I was not present at the meeting when this bill was considered, though I am on the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to state, for the information of the Senator from Wisconsin, that a bill similar to this has, I think, passed the Senate twice in preceding Congresses, and I understand it is the custom to pay the balance of a year's salary where a consul dies at his post of duty.

Mr. SPOONER. I have known of cases that were passed——

Mr. KEAN. If the Senator from Wisconsin will look at the letter of the Department of State, dated December 31, 1891, contained in the report of the committee, he will find a reference to the widows of consuls who have been paid in this way where the consuls have died at their posts of duty; but there have been very few instances of the kind.

Mr. SPOONER. Well, Mr. President, it will soon get to be a rule, and I think the Senate ought to consider whether it ought to become a rule.

Mr. WARREN. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator not think it would be a safe rule to adopt that, with the small salaries which this Government pays its consular agents, there might be some security to the widow and children, so that they might at least have money enough to get them home to the United States in case of the death of the consul?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly; but how are you going to grade it as to salary?

Mr. WARREN. I want to ask, on the line of principle, if the Senator does not think that as a rule this Government ought at least to bring home its own, whether dead or living, from the consular service without regard to salary, in cases of the death of consuls while on duty abroad? The various cases may be considered as they come up, each by itself, for there is no general rule; but in this case there seems to be a modest sum appropriated—only a matter of $1,500.

Mr. SPOONER. It is a year's salary. They always begin with modest sums, but the amounts are gradually increased.

Mr. WARREN. Yes, and the time to stop it is when the sums get large.

Mr. SPOONER. When the sums get large we will not stop them. Precedent, precedent, precedent will be appealed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The precedents alluded to in the report do not seem to be uniform.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, if the Senator from Connecticut will read the letter from the Department of State, he will see the instances in which widows of consuls were paid. The cases cited at the beginning of the report refer to ministers who died at their posts.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I wish, first, to read the very able report of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] citing the precedents. The first one is that of the widow of Bayard Taylor, who was paid $7,000, which, I think, was not a year's salary. The payment was made, the report says—to compensate his estate for the extraordinary expenses and losses incurred by it in consequence of his death so soon after reaching his post.

That was a special case. Then—

The joint resolution approved July 28, 1882, gave to Mrs. Hurlbut, widow of General Hurlbut (Captain Phelps's immediate predecessor), General Hurlbut having died while minister to Peru, one year's salary and legal allowances, after necessary deductions of salary paid.

I suppose that was his salary for the balance of the year. The same action was taken in the case of Mrs. Kilpatrick, widow of General Kilpatrick, who died while minister to Chile.

The report then gives the case of Mrs. Garnet, as follows:

The joint resolution approved August 1, 1882, gave to Mrs. Garnet, widow of the Rev. Henry Highland Garnet, who died while minister to Liberia, one year's salary and legal allowances, after deducting the amount received up to his death. Mr. Garnet had only been in Liberia a few weeks.

That was similar to the case of Bayard Taylor. The report continues:

The deficiency bill approved March 3, 1883, gave to Mrs. Marsh, widow of George P. Marsh, esq., who died while minister to Italy, the balance of one year's salary.

Then:

The act approved December 23, 1884, gave to Mrs. Jane Venable, widow of William E. Venable, esq., who died as minister to Guatemala, the sum of $5,630.87, being the balance of one year's salary. In this case Mr. Venable was commissioned March 14, 1857, and died at Guatemala August 22 of that year, before presenting his credentials. Consequently the action of Congress dates twenty-seven years after the minister's death.

The next case cited in the report is as follows:

The deficiency bill approved March 3, 1885, gave to Mrs. Wing, widow of E. Rumsey Wing, esq., who died while minister to Ecuador, and to Mrs. Hunt, widow of William H. Hunt, esq., who died while minister to Russia, a sum equal to six months' salary in each case. Mr. Wing was commissioned minister-resident November 16, 1869. Shortly afterwards, however, Congress discontinued the mission to Ecuador.

Now, with regard to consuls. The letter of the Secretary of State, after a reference to Senate report No. 238 of the Forty-ninth Congress, first session, where a list of the diplomatic officers who died in the service and whose families have received various sums, from six months' salary to one year's compensation, says:

Since then Congress has provided for Mrs. Verona E. Pollock, widow of Alexander L. Pollock, who died while consul of the United States at San Salvador, the sum of $6,840, which included a claim for the loss of private property, and her late husband's compensation.

Then, on April 17, 1900, Congress provided—for the payment to Mrs. Clare M. Ashby, widow of William W. Ashby, who was drowned while consul of the United States at Colon, the sum of $2,866, which represented the balance of one year's salary.

Again, in 1901—

Congress provided for the payment to Ella Lowery Moseley, widow of Robert E. Moseley, who died while consul-general at Singapore, a sum equal to three months' salary, or $750.

These are the only cases of payment of this nature to widows of consular officers that the Department recalls at present.

So that the precedents have not been uniform in the amount which has been paid.

As the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] says, I think this bill becomes important from the fact that, if we pass it, it will be considered as setting a precedent for paying a year's salary to the widow of any consul who may die in the service.

Mr. President, why should we pay such sums to the widows of consuls and not pay them to the widows of other Government officials, wherever serving, whether in Washington or any of the States of our Republic? I know that we pay a year's salary to the widow of a Senator who dies; I know that we pay a sum equal to six months' salary to the widows of the officers of the Senate who die in the service, which sum is to include all the expenses of the funerals; but what is there about a consul's office which entitles his widow to a year's salary when he dies any more than that of an Auditor of the Treasury Department, a Cabinet officer, or one of the assistant secretaries?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Yes.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If one of our ministers or ambassadors or any other officer of the diplomatic corps stationed abroad dies, is the salary of such officer for that year paid to his widow?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. In some cases that has been done by Congress. The practice, however, has not been uniform, I think.

Mr. CULLOM. It is not the rule.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. For example, the ambassador to Germany, I think, gets a salary of $17,500; and if he died his widow would be paid that amount. Is that the idea?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It seems to me, Mr. President, we can not stop very well with consuls. A consul is an officer of no higher grade than a Cabinet officer, or an Assistant Secretary of one of the Departments, or a judge of the district court in the District of Columbia, or a United States attorney in any of the districts of the United States, or a district judge. I know that in one or two instances we have made appropriations for the widows of deceased officials. I remember we did make an appropriation in the case of Mrs. Miller, the widow of Justice Miller, of the Supreme Court, but if we pass this bill I do not see why the widow of every consul who may die at his post should not feel that she has a claim, under the practice of the Government, to one year's salary.

If in the case of a consul of the United States dying at his post a year's salary is to be paid to his widow, why should not the same practice be followed if the Commissioner of Pensions should die? Why would not his widow be entitled to the same favor, as well as the widow of the Commissioner of Education or of the Commissioner of Labor or of any of the Assistant Secretaries? The principle would be extended to cover the families of the deceased; and if the widows of the officers I have named are entitled to this bounty, why not the widow or family of every person employed in the service of the Government of the United States? Is there any reason why we should do this in the case of a consul dying at his post which does not apply with equal force to every person in the employment of the Government?

There has been a good deal of talk about a civil pension—that is, a pension for civil officers after having served the Government and having become too old to be efficient. But that proposition has not been carried out; and the appropriation carried in the bill under discussion is in the nature of a pension.

Right here I wish to speak of a matter which was suggested by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. He said this bill or similar bills had twice passed the Senate. I know that is so, Mr. President, but bills of this character pass the Senate without any consideration, without discussion, without question, usually in the hurry of business when there is no time for discussion. I do not think that action by the Senate settles the principle at all. I think, as the Senator from Wisconsin has said, it is a very grave question whether we ought, by passing this bill, to establish the principle that whenever a person in the service of the Government dies his widow is to receive a year's salary. I think there is no special reason in this case why the bill should be passed. If it were a bill to bring home the remains of a deceased consul——

Mr. GALLINGER. The Government always does that.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I think that is already provided for by the Government. This bill is not to reimburse the widow for any expense connected with the bringing home of the remains or the funeral expenses; it is simply saying that where a consul dies away from this country his widow shall have a year's salary voted to her by Congress. I can not see why, if that is to be done, there should not be voted to the widow or family of every person holding office under the Government a year's salary.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, first I want to make a parliamentary inquiry, and that is as to whether it has not heretofore been the custom that in proceeding to the Calendar we have acted under Rule VIII, and not under Rule IX, so that we could take up unobjected cases?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. When the Calendar is taken up before 2 o'clock, it is under Rule VIII; but when the Calendar of General Orders is taken up after 2 o'clock, it is under Rule IX.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have heretofore noticed that we have had two Calendars; that proceeding under Rule VIII certain objected cases went to the Calendar which was said to be under Rule IX, and I had thought our custom had been, regardless of the hour, to proceed under Rule VIII. If I am wrong, of course I submit.

Mr. HALE. It can easily be settled at any time by asking unanimous consent when we take up the Calendar that we proceed under Rule VIII.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. HALE. That is the Calendar under which we pass a great many cases that are satisfactory to Senators. Under Rule IX we get the fighting cases.

Mr. GALLINGER. I had it in mind, if the ruling of the Chair should be against me, to ask unanimous consent now that we consider the Calendar under Rule VIII.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would be obliged to rule against the proposition of the Senator. If the Calendar was commenced at any time before 2 o'clock, the Chair would hold that it was under Rule VIII, with the limitations of debate and all that sort of thing, but when it reaches 2 o'clock and the Chair lays before the Senate the Calendar of General Orders, the Chair would rule then that it is proceeded with under the general rule of the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Has the Chair ruled that unanimous consent can not be given that we proceed under Rule VIII?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unanimous consent will do anything except amend the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. GALLINGER. Precisely. That is what I thought, Mr. President, and for that reason I now ask unanimous consent that we proceed under Rule VIII in the further consideration of the Calendar to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator intend to have it apply to the pending bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it apply to everything.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should think so, sir. I am quite willing that this bill should go over.

I will say in this connection that I this morning introduced a bill to make an allowance of $1,500 to the widow of a consul who died recently, and who was from my own State. I do not believe in the principle at all, but if this bill is to be paid, I want the New Hampshire bill to be paid.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the further consideration of the Calendar to-day shall be under Rule VIII. Under Rule VIII there is a limitation of the time of debate; there is a limitation as to how many times a Senator may address himself to the same question; there is also a provision that if objection is made the case must go over, unless on motion it is determined by the Senate that it shall be considered. If it is so considered, then the ordinary rules prevail and not the provisions of Rule VIII. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire? The Chair hears none.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill which has been under consideration go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill will go over. When objection is made, a measure simply goes over, retaining its place.

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly; retaining its place.

CERTIFICATION OF LAND OFFICE RECORDS.

The bill (S. 372) authorizing the recorder of the General Land Office to issue certified copies of patents, records, books, and papers was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that copies of any patents, records, books, or papers in the General Land Office, authenticated by the seal and certified by the recorder of such Office, shall be evidence equally with the originals thereof, to the same force and effect as when certified by the Commissioner of that Office.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill why it is necessary to dispense with the signature of the head of a bureau and simply allow the chief of a division practically to certify to official papers? I should like to know of some reason for it. Heretofore we have required the Commissioner of the General Land Office to certify. Now, here is the recorder, a chief of a division in the Land Office, who is to certify to papers with the same effect as if the Commissioner of the General Land Office had done it.

Mr. LODGE. The bill requires the certification by the Commissioner.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No.

Mr. LODGE. I think it is a mistake in the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. No; I think not. I think it is just the reverse.

Mr. LODGE. No; the bill says, in the last line—oh, yes; I see.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is to do away with the certification by the Commissioner.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator is correct.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not think it ought to be agreed to. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. COCKRELL subsequently said: I wish to have the Senate recur to Senate bill 372. I requested that it might go over.

I find that it does not provide for the certification of all papers by this officer, but simply that he shall certify copies of patents which have already been issued and which are in the recorder's office. I find that the Commissioner of the General Land Office wants the bill to pass. That being the object of it, I think it ought to be passed.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RESERVOIR RESERVATIONS.

The bill (S. 122) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to restore to public entry lands embraced in whole or in part within segregations for reservoirs was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that any or all of the lands heretofore included within reservations for reservoir purposes may, in the discretion of the Secretary, be thrown open to entry and settlement under the land laws as though such reservation had never been made.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MINOR COINS.

The bill (S. 903) providing for the purchase of metal and the coinage of minor coins, and the distribution and redemption of said coins was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BERRY. I should like to ask the Senator from Rhode Island whether the bill affects adversely or in any way the mint at New Orleans?

Mr. ALDRICH. Under the law as it now stands minor coins are coined only at the mint in Philadelphia. This proposes to extend the same privileges to the mints at New Orleans, San Francisco, and Denver.

Mr. BERRY. To New Orleans?

Mr. ALDRICH. To New Orleans; to give them privileges which they do not now have.

Mr. BERRY. I did not observe the word there, and I was not sure about it. Is it a unanimous report from the Committee on Finance?

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Finance with amendments. The first amendment of the Committee on Finance was, to insert after the enacting clause the following:

That sections 3528 and 3529 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same are hereby, amended so as to read as follows.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 1, line 6, before the word "that," to insert "Sec. 3528;" in line 10, after the word "may," to strike out "direct" and insert "designate, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury;" in line 11, after the word "transferred," to strike out "by the Secretary of the Treasury;" and on page 2, line 2, after the words "San Francisco," to insert "Denver;" so as to read:

SEC. 3528. That for the purchase of metal for the minor coinage authorized by this act a sum not exceeding $200,000 in lawful money of the United States shall, upon the recommendation of the Director of the Mint and in such sums as he may designate, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, be transferred to the credit of the superintendents of the mints at Philadelphia, San Francisco, Denver, and New Orleans, at which establishments, until otherwise provided by law, such coinage shall be carried on, etc.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 19, to strike out "Sec. 2" and insert "Sec. 3529."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, after line 11, to strike out the following:

SEC. 3. That sections 29 and 30 of an act entitled "An act revising and amending the laws relative to the mints, assay offices, and coinage of the United States," approved February 12, 1873, are hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LEGAL REPRESENTATIVES OF NAPOLEON B. GIDDINGS.

The bill (S. 56) for the relief of the legal representatives of Napoleon B. Giddings was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of War to cause to be investigated the circumstances of the alleged taking from Napoleon B. Giddings, in January, 1847, at Santa Fe, N. Mex., and deposit with A. B. Dyer, lieutenant of ordnance, United States Army, by order of Sterling Price, colonel commanding the army in New Mexico at that time, of 140 kegs of gunpowder; and if the powder was never returned to Giddings, then the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to cause to be paid to the legal representatives of Giddings the reasonable market value of the powder.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

M. E. SAVILLE.

The bill (S. 61) for the relief of M. E. Saville was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of War to cause to be investigated embezzlement of quartermaster and commissary funds and stores at Fort Gill, Okla., discovered while M. E. Saville, first lieutenant, Tenth Regiment United States Infantry, was quartermaster and commissary at that post; and if upon such examination the Secretary is satisfied that Saville exercised due diligence and care in the discharge of his duties he is directed to release and discharge Saville from any further liability.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SHIPPING BETWEEN UNITED STATES AND PHILIPPINE PORTS.

The bill (S. 2259) to regulate shipping in trade between ports of the United States and ports or places in the Philippine Archipelago, between ports or places in the Philippine Archipelago, and for other purposes, was announced as the next business in order on the Calendar.

Mr. LODGE. Let the bill go over, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will go over.

RUDOLF HERBST.

The bill (S. 126) for the relief of Rudolf Herbst was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the accounting officers of the Treasury to reopen the claim of Rudolf Herbst, as acting hospital steward of the United States Army and hospital steward of the First Montana Volunteer Infantry, and allow him the pay, allowances, and extra pay of a hospital steward from August 18, 1898, to the date of the muster out of the First Montana Volunteer Infantry, less the pay, allowances, and extra pay received by him for that period.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COUNTY OF WHITE PINE, NEV.

The bill (S. 1741) for the relief of the county of White Pine, State of Nevada, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the county of White Pine, Nev., $769.67, to reimburse the county for money expended in caring for certain Indians who contracted smallpox during the smallpox epidemic from February 26 to July 1, 1901.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BUST OF GENERAL LAFAYETTE.

The joint resolution (S. R. 21) authorizing the purchase of a marble bust of General Lafayette, executed by David D'Angers, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appropriate the sum of $2,000 to enable the Joint Committee on the Library to purchase from Hawkins K. Jenkins, executor of the will of the late Dr. Gabriel F. Manigault, a marble bust of General Lafayette, executed by David D'Angers.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STATUE OF HENRY WADSWORTH LONGFELLOW.

The joint resolution (S. R. 20) authorizing the selection of a site and the erection of a pedestal for a bronze statue in Washington, D. C., in honor of the late Henry Wadsworth Longfellow was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes that the chairman of the Senate Committee on the Library, the chairman of the House Committee on the Library, and the Secretary of War shall be appointed a commission to select a site upon property belonging to the United States in the city of Washington, other than the Capitol or Library grounds, for the erection of a statue in bronze of the late Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, to be provided by the Longfellow Memorial Association.

For the preparation of the site so selected and the erection of a pedestal upon which to place the statue, etc., $4,000 is appropriated.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARKING OF GETTYSBURG BATTLEFIELD.

The bill (S. 2697) to amend an act authorizing the Secretary of War to cause to be erected monuments and markers on the battlefield of Gettysburg, Pa., to commemorate the valorous deeds of certain regiments and batteries of the United States Army was considered as in Committee or the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SECOND LIEUTENANTS, MARINE CORPS.

The bill (S. 2114) to fix the rank of certain officers in the Army was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes that any second lieutenant of the United States Marine Corps who may have been appointed second lieutenant of artillery since the 2d day of February, 1901, shall, in determining his lineal and relative rank, be entitled to the same credit for prior commissioned service as a lieutenant of volunteers appointed under the act entitled "An act to increase the efficiency of the permanent military establishment of the United States," approved February 2, 1901.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LEONARD L. DIETRICK.

The bill (S. 146) for the relief of Leonard L. Dietrick was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, on page 1, line 12, after the word "Dietrick," to strike out "repaid" and insert "accounted for and paid;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Leonard L. Dietrick, late first lieutenant, Thirty-fourth Infantry United States Volunteers, the sum of $120, said sum having been United States funds stolen from his safe at Penaranda, Nueva Ecija, P. I., at some time between December 3, 1900, and December 24, 1900, while he was acting commissary officer; and which sum the said Leonard L. Dietrick accounted for and paid to the proper officer of the United States from his own private funds.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COUNTY GOVERNMENT IN HAWAII.

The bill (S. 2400) to approve act No. 31 of the session of 1903 of the legislature of the Territory of Hawaii, approved April 22, 1903, entitled "An act providing for the organization and government of counties and districts, and the management and control of public works and public institutions therein," was announced as the next business in order on the Calendar.

Mr. HALE. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over.

REMOVAL OF DERELICTS.

The bill (S. 2263) to provide for the removal or destruction of derelicts was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes that the President may detail any public vessel to remove or destroy any derelict from the course of vessels at sea. Any public vessel when so detailed shall be under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor.

One hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars is appropriated for the construction, under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, of a steam vessel especially fitted for and adapted to the purpose of removing or destroying derelicts from the course of vessels at sea.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LIFE-SAVING STATION AT NOME, ALASKA.

The bill (S. 2692) to establish a life-saving station at Cape Nome, Alaska, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to establish a life-saving station at Cape Nome, Alaska, at such point as the General Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service may recommend, the life-saving boats and apparatus placed there under the authority of the act making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902, to form a part of the equipment of said station.

Mr. PERKINS. I move to amend the bill by striking out, in line 4, before "Nome" the word "Cape."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to establish a life-saving station at Nome, Alaska."

NATIONAL CEMETERY, PENSACOLA, FLA.

The bill (S. 619) making an appropriation for completing the construction of the road to the national cemetery near Pensacola, Fla., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appropriate $32,000 for the purpose of completing the construction of the roadway from Pensacola, Fla., to the national cemetery near that city.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELECTRIC LIGHT AT HONOLULU.

The bill (S. 2401) to approve a special act duly enacted by the legislature of the Territory of Hawaii to authorize and provide for the manufacture, distribution, and supply of electric light and power on the island of Oahu, Territory of Hawaii, was announced as next in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let that bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over.

REPUBLIC OF PANAMA.

The resolution, submitted by Mr. HOAR December 10, 1903, requesting the President to communicate to the Senate such facts as may be in his possession or in that of any of the Executive Departments as will show whether, at the time of the ratification of the treaty with the Republic of Panama, that province had successfully established its independence, etc., was announced as next in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the resolution go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will go over.

STATUE OF GEN. JAMES MILLER.

The bill (S. 1634) for the erection of a statue to the memory of Gen. James Miller at Peterboro, N. H., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appropriate $5,000 for the erection of a statue, in bronze or granite, to the memory of Gen. James Miller, the hero of Lundys Lane, at Peterboro, N. H., which sum shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, or such officer as he may designate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN F. WESTON.

The bill (S. 2696) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay John F. Weston the sum of $241.60, etc., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to John F. Weston the sum of $241.60, being compensation for loss, in 1877, of his professional books and clothing while changing station, under orders, from the cantonment on Tongue River, Montana, to Helena, Mont., as captain and commissary of subsistence, United States Army.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER BOOK OF GEN. ARTHUR ST. CLAIR.

The joint resolution (S. R. 8) authorizing the Secretary of War to negotiate with John T. Dolan, of Portland, Oreg., for purchase of original manuscript copy of "Order book of Gen. Arthur St. Clair," was announced as next in order.

Mr. LODGE. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution goes over.

HEIRS OF JOSEPH W. ETHERIDGE AND JOHN M. RICHARDSON.

The bill (S. 468) for the relief of the widow and children of the late Joseph W. Etheridge and the widow of the late John M. Richardson was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to the widow and children (in equal proportions) of the late Joseph W. Etheridge, late superintendent of the sixth life-saving district, who died February 15, 1893, from pneumonia, contracted by him from exposure in the line of his duty in the Life-Saving Service, a sum equal to two years' pay of a district superintendent of the Life-Saving Service, and to pay the same amount to the widow of the late John M. Richardson, late superintendent of the first life-saving district, who died the 13th day of June, 1896, from the effects of a trip of inspection through his district, in the line of his duty in the Life-Saving Service, made by him while in an enfeebled condition, against the advice of his physicians and at the cost of his life.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

IDAHO SOLDIERS AND SAILORS' HOME.

The bill (S. 250) granting to the State of Idaho 50,000 acres of land to aid in the continuation, enlargement, and maintenance of the Idaho Soldiers and Sailors' Home was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It grants 50,000 acres of the unappropriated nonmineral public lands within the State of Idaho to that State, the same to be selected by the proper authorities thereof, to aid in the continuation, enlargement, and maintenance of the Idaho State Soldiers and Sailors' Home, and such portion as may not be necessary for the purpose specified shall be applied to the support of such public, benevolent, reformatory, or other educational institution as the legislature of the State may designate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RELIEF OF CERTAIN SETTLERS.

The bill (S. 278) to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands and to provide for the repayment of certain fees, purchase money, and commissions paid on void entries of public lands" was announced as next in order.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over.

NATURALIZATION OF PORTO RICANS.

The bill (S. 2345) to make applicable the provisions of the naturalization laws of the United States to Porto Rico, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KEAN. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. COCKRELL (for Mr. FORAKER) December 19, 1903, as follows:

The Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico have had under consideration the following bill:

"A bill to make applicable the provisions of the naturalization laws of the United States to Porto Rico, and for other purposes.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all the applicable provisions of the naturalization laws of the United States shall apply to and be held to authorize the admission to citizenship of all persons not citizens who owe permanent allegiance to the United States, and who may become residents of any State or organized Territory of the United States, with the following modifications: The applicant shall not be required to renounce allegiance to any foreign sovereignty; he shall make his declaration of intention to become a citizen of the United States at least one year prior to his admission; and residence within the jurisdiction of the United States, owing such permanent allegiance, shall be regarded as residence within the United States within the meaning of the five years' residence clause of the existing law.

"SEC. 2. That the provisions of the act approved March 2, 1887, entitled 'An act to establish agricultural experiment stations in connection with the colleges established in the several States under the provisions of an act approved July 2, 1862, and of the acts supplementary thereto,' and the provisions of the act approved August 30, 1890, being 'An act to apply a portion of the proceeds of the public lands to the more complete endowment and support of the colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts established under the provisions of an act of Congress approved July 2, 1862,' be, and the same are hereby, extended to Porto Rico.

"SEC. 3. That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, empowered to authorize the construction or extension of any wharf, pier, dolphin, boom, weir, breakwater, sea wall, bulkhead, jetty, or other structure on any of the lands belonging to the United States which underlie the harbor areas and navigable waters and streams lying in or surrounding the island of Porto Rico and the islands lying adjacent thereto, and to authorize the filling in or dredging of such lands, and to authorize any of the above obstructions in the said harbor areas and navigable waters and streams: Provided, however, That the plans for such work be first recommended by the Chief of Engineers."

The passage of the measure is recommended. The following brief analysis of the sections of the bill shows the scope and purpose of the proposed legislation.

Section 1, authorizing the naturalization of citizens of Porto Rico, was favorably reported from the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico at the last session in the same form in which it appears in this measure. The committee now simply repeats what it said at that time in support of the provision, namely:

"The naturalization laws of the United States now in force contemplate the admission to citizenship by naturalization of only aliens who prior to naturalization owe allegiance to some foreign sovereignty. The inhabitants of Porto Rico and the Philippines, Guam, Tutuila, and other insular possessions have not been made citizens of the United States. They have, however, passed under our jurisdiction, and are under our sovereignty, and owe allegiance to the United States, and do not owe allegiance to anybody else; and still they are neither aliens nor citizens. Not being aliens, they can not be naturalized, and for that reason citizenship is to them impossible; their situation in that respect is worse, therefore, than that of aliens. Such an anomalous result was not intended by the legislation that has been enacted affecting the civil and political status of the inhabitants of our recently acquired insular possessions. The section provides a remedy."

This section was contained in the bill (H. R. 17546) to provide a Delegate to the House of Representatives of the United States from Porto Rico, which passed the Senate March 3, 1903. It failed to become law, however, by reason of the lack of time on the part of the House to consider and agree to the Senate amendments.

Section 2 of the bill extends the provisions of the Hatch and Morrill laws, so called, to the island of Porto Rico. The effect of this section will be to entitle Porto Rico to be paid the sum of $40,000 annually for the support of a college for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts. Every other Territory of the United States, as well as every State in this Union, now has the benefits of these laws. There is no place where such an educational help is more needed or where it will be better appreciated. This section, without the incorporation of the Hatch law, was also included in the bill heretofore mentioned (H. R. 17546), which passed the Senate at the second session of the last Congress.

Section 3 of the bill is drawn in the interest of improved harbor facilities for the island, the necessity for which has been brought to the attention of this committee through numerous petitions, memorials, etc., praying for the legislation proposed, received from time to time, the latest being one from the municipal council of the city of Ponce and one from the executive council of Porto Rico. The bill H. R. 17546, above referred to as having passed the Senate at the second session of the Fifty-seventh Congress contained this section also.

Mr. SPOONER. I wish to make an inquiry of the Senator who reports the bill.

Mr. FORAKER. It was reported during my absence by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], but it was reported, as it states here, for me.

Mr. SPOONER. I listened to the report or a portion of it.

Mr. FORAKER. It was reported in that way, I suppose, simply because I am the chairman of the committee.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the bill make any change in the political status of the Porto Ricans?

Mr. FORAKER. No; it makes no change whatever.

Mr. SPOONER. Does it provide for a Delegate?

Mr. FORAKER. It does not.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It provides the machinery for naturalization.

Mr. FORAKER. It simply provides for their naturalization. It is evident from the provisions of the law, and it has been so held by the courts, that they are not aliens. It has not been settled yet that they are not citizens, but the language of the law is such as to preclude that idea, as we think, and it has been held that in order to become citizens they must be naturalized. Under the law as it now stands they can not be naturalized, because the first requirement of the law is that they shall forswear allegiance to some foreign potentate or power. They do not owe any such allegiance. They owe allegiance only to us. Their condition is worse than the condition of the Spaniard who elected to remain loyal to Spain and continued to live in Porto Rico, because he can become naturalized and the Porto Rican can not.

Mr. NELSON. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. Has any court decided that the Porto Ricans are not citizens of the United States?

Mr. FORAKER. No; no court has so decided.

Mr. QUARLES. It was decided that they are not aliens.

Mr. FORAKER. The Supreme Court has recently decided that they are not aliens, and the point made in the report is that they are not aliens owing allegiance to some foreign Government or power, and for that reason the naturalization laws as they now stand do not apply to these people to enable naturalization.

Mr. SPOONER. Under the operation of this bill do they become naturalized?

Mr. FORAKER. They do not. They have to become naturalized.

Mr. SPOONER. When they come to this country?

Mr. FORAKER. They become naturalized when they come into this country, and not until they come in.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I should like to ask the Senator, on that very point, the meaning of this language:

And residence within the jurisdiction of the United States, owing such permanent allegiance, shall be regarded as residence within the United States.

Mr. FORAKER. That is as to the time when they can be admitted as citizens by the court; but the first provision, as the Senator will see, is that the applicable provisions of the laws of the United States shall apply to these Porto Ricans. They have to appear before a court of the United States or of some State.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I did not so understand it. I only noticed an apparent conflict between the provision which I read and the prior provision.

Mr. FORAKER. That simply means that when they shall have resided under our jurisdiction, in Porto Rico or elsewhere, for a period of five years, they may when they come into this country, showing that fact, be eligible to naturalization.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Wisconsin asked if there was anything in this bill that changes the status of these people, to which the Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the committee, I think, replied that there is not. It seems to me the Senator can not go quite so far as that. It appears to me that it does change the status considerably; whether desirable or not is another question.

I should like to have that part of the bill read which touches the consideration at the moment in the Senator's mind, about where these Porto Ricans must be naturalized and whether a five years' residence in Porto Rico heretofore is adequate to entitle them to apply for citizenship. Let that be read.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator from Maine will pardon me, before it is read I will say to him that I did not intend to answer in the broad way he seems to have understood me. The effect of this bill is not to change the status, but it is to afford to Porto Ricans means of changing their status; that is, the effect of the bill is to give them some way in which to become naturalized citizens of the United States. They have no such way now. That is the only purpose of it. It is provided in the bill that if they have lived five years under the jurisdiction of the United States, under the laws of the United States, whether that be in Porto Rico or in the Philippines or elsewhere, they shall, when applying for naturalization in accordance with the laws now in force, be admitted to naturalization.

Mr. HALE. The clause in lines 6 and 7, perhaps, covers what was in my mind, but here is the whole provision:

That all the applicable provisions of the naturalization laws of the United States shall apply to and be held to authorize the admission to citizenship of all persons not citizens who owe permanent allegiance to the United States—and who may become residents of any State or organized Territory of the United States.

That is intended, of course, to cover Porto Rico—

That, the Senator would say, excludes Porto Rico from that part of it.

Mr. FORAKER. What I said awhile ago, and repeat, is that under the provisions of this law a Porto Rican can not become naturalized in Porto Rico, in the courts of Porto Rico; he must come here.

Mr. HALE. The language is—and who may become residents of any State or organized Territory.

That would not include Porto Rico?

Mr. FORAKER. No.

Mr. HALE. So that no Porto Rican, after this bill passes, can be naturalized unless he becomes a resident of the United States.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. And makes his declaration.

Mr. HALE. Or who may become a resident of any State or Territory, just as if he came from Ireland or Italy or Germany.

Mr. FORAKER. Precisely the same, except that he is allowed credit for the time he has lived under our jurisdiction, whether that be in Porto Rico——

Mr. HALE. Where is that provision?

The applicant shall not be required to renounce allegiance to any foreign sovereignty—

That is right—

he shall make his declaration of intention to become a citizen of the United States at least one year prior to his admission; and residence within the jurisdiction of the United States, owing such permanent allegiance, shall be regarded as residence within the United States within the meaning of the five-years' residence clause of the existing law.

That is, he must count up five years either of residence since the passage of the Foraker Act or in the United States.

Mr. FORAKER. Yes.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If a citizen of the Philippines comes over here and under the provisions of this proposed act becomes naturalized and then goes back there, he is no longer a citizen of the Philippine Islands, but a citizen of the United States, is he not?

Mr. FORAKER. He is no longer what?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. He is a citizen of the United States. He comes over here and becomes naturalized, and when he goes back he goes back as a citizen of the United States like anybody else who goes from the United States. Would not that be the effect of this bill?

There are two or three propositions embraced in the bill which present some confusion, at least in my mind. It raises rather an anomalous condition of things.

Mr. LODGE. The bill does not touch the Philippine Islands at all.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It does not? I do not know.

Mr. LODGE. It refers only to citizens of Porto Rico.

Mr. GALLINGER. It does not in the text.

Mr. FORAKER. It does only in the title.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is all.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not know but that it would be construed to apply to anybody living anywhere under the jurisdiction of the United States.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes; under the jurisdiction of the United States.

Mr. FORAKER. The point I would make in answer to the Senator's suggestion is, if that be true, what harm can come from it? People do not come here in considerable number merely for the sake of becoming naturalized and then going back.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I agree with the Senator. I do not know that there would be any harm in it, but it will at once occur to every Senator that there is at the moment confusion in that statement and it raises a questionable situation.

I have no disposition to object, of course, to the consideration of the bill, but does it not occur to the Senator that there are two or three matters of confusion suggested here by the queries of Senators, and that it might well go over?

Mr. FORAKER. No; I do not see any confusion, if the Senator will pardon me for saying that. It is probably due to the fact that we have given a good deal of study to this subject. We had it before our committee at the last session of the last Congress and the bill was then reported. It was considered in the Senate, and the Senate passed unanimously a bill in these exact words. There is no change whatever.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Of course this bill does apply to the Philippines as well as to Porto Rico.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not think there should be any trouble about it. I do not know why——

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me?

Mr. FORAKER. In a minute. I do not know why it should not apply to a citizen of the Philippines living there, an inhabitant there, and owing allegiance to us, owing permanent allegiance to us as a people. That expression was furnished us by the State Department. This measure was referred to the State Department and very carefully considered there. If my memory does not serve me incorrectly, it originated with the State Department. They communicated to us in regard to it, saying that this trouble constantly arises. The citizens of Porto Rico and the citizens of the Philippines also, for I think it would have equal application to them, owe us permanent allegiance; and yet if they see fit to come here and reside in good faith and for all time they never can become naturalized. Their condition is worse than the condition of their fellow-citizens who, under the terms of the treaty of peace, elected to retain their allegiance to Spain.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator will observe——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under Rule VIII no Senator is entitled to speak more than once.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I was going to put a query to the Senator. However, I will not insist upon it.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not intend to speak on the bill. I only wish to ask the Senator from Ohio whether, in view of its importance, it would not be better that it should go over and not be considered under the five-minute rule?

Mr. FORAKER. I am willing that it shall go over, if Senators think they want to discuss it; but it seems to me to be a very simple proposition. It appears to me that these Porto Ricans, who have been under our jurisdiction and who have been good and loyal people, ought to be put on at least as good footing as the Spaniard who elected to retain his allegiance to Spain.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. PETTUS. I desire to ask a question of the Senator in charge of the bill. Would it not be better to make the island of Porto Rico a Territory and thereby solve the question as to citizenship?

Mr. FORAKER. Well, that is a different kind of a question. I have not as much objection to that as some of my colleagues in the Senate have expressed. I think the Porto Ricans have a good government now. I think they have a very fortunate position under the law under which they are living and by which they are being governed. I doubt if a Territorial government would be of any advantage to them or, at the present time, of any advantage to us. But whether they are to have the one or the other, it seems to me that at once they ought to be given the right to become naturalized citizens of the United States if they so desire.

Mr. HALE. This will not apply to many people. Very few of those people will come here.

Mr. FORAKER. Very few.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. They will come over and go back there.

Mr. FORAKER. If they do go back, they go back as citizens, and that will be all the better for us.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Mr. President, I rise simply to observe that I think the bill is certainly a very meritorious one. It seems to me to be the merest act of justice to give the people of Porto Rico citizenship here. As it is, they are not citizens of the United States, nor are they capable of becoming citizens. Certainly there will be comparatively few of them who will come here; but if they do come, they ought to have the right to become naturalized.

Mr. FORAKER. In other words, owing us permanent allegiance ought not to put them in a worse situation than is the alien; their state ought not to be worse than that of aliens. I hope the bill will pass without amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to inquire, through the Chair, of the Senator having the bill in charge what is meant by the phrase in the last line on page 1, "residence within the jurisdiction of the United States?" Are not those people now within the jurisdiction of the United States?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly they are; but the purpose is to give them credit for the five years required to entitle them to naturalization, although they are living in Porto Rico.

Mr. HEYBURN. Would they not be within the jurisdiction of the United States if they lived in the Philippine Islands?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly they would.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then, it seems to me, the question of residence is not really material to be expressed in the bill, inasmuch as they now reside within the jurisdiction of the United States.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will permit me, under the naturalization laws as they now exist, those people must reside here within the United States for five years. And the purpose of the committee in framing the bill in this case was to let those people have credit for the time they have lived under our jurisdiction, whether here or in Porto Rico, owing us allegiance.

Mr. HEYBURN. Is it the intention that they shall live within the jurisdiction of the United States for the period named in the bill, even though they may have lived within that jurisdiction in the island of Porto Rico?

Mr. FORAKER. When we come to consider whether they have been five years residing within the jurisdiction of the United States, the purpose of the bill is to give them credit for all the time that they have lived under our jurisdiction and have been owing us allegiance.

Mr. HEYBURN. Do I understand that they will be entitled, upon application for citizenship, to have credit for the time that they have resided in Porto Rico since it has been under our jurisdiction?

Mr. FORAKER. They would be entitled to whatever time they can show they have lived here or in Porto Rico since the island has been under our jurisdiction and subject to our laws.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, so far as I am concerned my mind is entirely clear that the bill is a perfectly harmless one. The people of Porto Rico are citizens of the United States in that general sense that all persons who are subject to our jurisdiction are citizens. There are two classes of citizenship. One is a citizenship by which we understand a man to be a voter. That right can only be acquired through legislation. But there is another citizenship, as to which the word is used in the same sense as is the term "subject" in monarchical countries.

If Senators will examine the reports they will see that the Supreme Court has decided that under our immigration laws the people of Porto Rico are not aliens, and I think, under the fourteenth amendment, they are clearly citizens of the United States in the broad general sense. If Senators will examine the case of Governor Boyd, of Nebraska, I think they will find the principles laid down in that case which will cover this case. There is such a thing as naturalization by the incorporation of one country as a part of another country. Where we incorporate a country and make it a part of our own we make the people of that country citizens of our own.

Having this view of the case, I regard the bill as perfectly harmless. I have not any doubt at all that if this matter should be brought before the court the people of Porto Rico would be deemed citizens of the United States in the general sense; not as voters, but as citizens in the same sense that the term "subject" is used in monarchial countries.

Mr. FORAKER. That is, the term "citizen" in the international sense is equivalent to the term "subject" in a monarchy, where they owe us allegiance and we owe them protection.

Mr. NELSON. In that sense they are citizens, but in respect to the right of suffrage that is a matter regulated wholly by local law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is still before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I think the bill ought to go over, Mr. President.

Mr. FORAKER. I hope not. I want the bill to pass.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If the Senator is anxious about it, I will withdraw my request. Otherwise I should like to have the bill go over, in order that I may have an opportunity to examine it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No objection has been made, because no Senator has risen in his place to make an objection.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Does the Chair rule that asking a Senator a question is speaking within the rule?

Mr. FORAKER. No; there is no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] has exhausted his five minutes two or three times over. [Laughter.]

Mr. FORAKER. Very well.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator from Ohio has himself admitted that the bill makes the naturalization laws apply to Porto Rico.

Mr. FORAKER. Oh, no; I did not admit that.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I think the RECORD will so show; and now he admits it does apply to the Philippines. It is a pretty broad division. I think that I shall have no objection, so far as I am concerned, to the bill; but however much has been said here, it is perfectly clear that Senators have had new thoughts suggested to them as the discussion of the matter has proceeded. If, however, the Senator from Ohio is anxious that the bill shall pass, I have no objection. Otherwise I should like the bill to go over.

Mr. LODGE. I have not spoken, I believe, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the title of the bill is faulty, but the bill itself is perfectly correct. There is no misunderstanding possible about it. The title simply needs to be made commensurate with the bill—that is all—and that can be done when that stage in the consideration of the bill is reached. The bill is not from my committee, but I sincerely hope it may pass, as it contains provisions which I am certain are extremely important to the welfare of the people of that island.

Mr. FORAKER. I will move an amendment to the title at the proper time.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FORAKER, the title was amended so as to read: "A bill to amend the provisions of the naturalization laws of the United States, and for other purposes."

Mr. SPOONER. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill has been passed, and I ask that my motion may go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin enters a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill has been passed.

ALABAMA RIVER BRIDGE NEAR MONTGOMERY, ALA.

The bill (S. 2465) to authorize the Montgomery and Autauga Bridge Company to construct a bridge across the Alabama River near the city of Montgomery, Ala., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the act approved March 3, 1901, entitled "An act to authorize the Montgomery and Autauga Bridge Company to construct a bridge across the Alabama River near the city of Montgomery, Ala.," which act has expired by limitation, be, and is hereby, revived and reenacted.

SEC. 2. That section 5 of the said act be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 5. That all street-railway companies desiring to use said bridge shall be allowed to do so upon paying a reasonable compensation for such use, and all telephone and telegraph companies shall be granted equal rights and privileges in the construction and operation of their lines across said bridge; and if actual construction of the bridge herein authorized shall not be commenced within one year and be completed within three years from March 3, 1904, the rights and privileges hereby granted shall cease and be determined."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to revive and amend an act entitled 'An act to authorize the Montgomery and Autauga Bridge Company to construct a bridge across the Alabama River near the city of Montgomery, Ala.'"

WYOMING STATE SOLDIERS AND SAILORS' HOME.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator withhold that motion for a moment?

Mr. GALLINGER. I will, with pleasure.

Mr. WARREN. I desire to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of a small bill, which will leave me under some embarrassment unless it is taken care of. There were two bills, identical in import, one referring to the State of Idaho and the other to Wyoming, which were reported from the Committee on Public Lands or ordered to be reported at the same time. Through an error—the Senator who made the report is not now present—one was placed on the Calendar far removed from the other. I should like to ask unanimous consent that at this time Senate bill 921 may be taken up and considered.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will yield for that purpose, but give notice that I will renew my motion for an executive session immediately after the bill shall have been disposed of.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 921) granting to the State of Wyoming 50,000 acres of land to aid in the continuation, enlargement, and maintenance of the Wyoming State Soldiers and Sailors' Home.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It grants 50,000 acres of the unappropriated nonmineral public lands within the State of Wyoming to that State, to be selected by the proper authorities thereof, to aid in the continuation, enlargement, and maintenance of the Wyoming State Soldiers and Sailors' Home, but such portion of the granted lands as may not be found necessary for the purpose specified shall be applied to the support of such public, benevolent, reformatory, or other educational institution as the legislature of the State may designate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. GALLINGER. I now renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, January 28, 1904, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 27, 1904.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, the Committee on War Claims was discharged from consideration of the bill (H. R. 9313) to pay all Federal soldiers honorably discharged $2 per day while confined in Confederate military prisons thirty days or more; and the same was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

POSTAL CARS.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following privileged report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish to the House of Representatives information showing the serial number of all postal cars for which the Post-Office Department is paying rental in addition to the amount paid for carrying the mails therein, the name of the railroad company owning the same, and the time of service of each car from date of original construction and first use, together with all changes of serial number of car and ownership.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, to which has been referred House resolution No. 121, calling upon the Postmaster-General for certain information relative to the service performed by railway post-office cars, has had the same under consideration, and begs to report the same to the House, and with the recommendation that as amended the same do pass.

Amend as follows: Strike out all of the preamble. Add after the word "ownership," in line 9, the following: "and the condition of said cars on June 30, 1903."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were considered, and agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. OVERSTREET, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

FLYING-MACHINE EXPERIMENTS AND CONSTRUCTION.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged report from the Committee on Appropriations.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish the House of Representatives at his earliest convenience with a statement showing the amount of money disbursed by his Department in the promotion of flying-machine experiments and construction, whether under the direction of Prof. S. P. Langley or otherwise, together with the dates when said disbursements were made and funds from which they were drawn.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman from Indiana any motion to submit?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I move the adoption of the report and that the resolution lie on the table.

The SPEAKER. That is the first intimation the Chair has had of any motion to lay on the table. The gentleman from Indiana moves that the report lie on the table.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman to have the resolution again reported.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will again read the resolution.

The Clerk again reported the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana desire to have the report read in his time?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I do.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HEMENWAY, from the Committee on Appropriations, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred House resolution No. 160, requesting the Secretary of War to furnish a statement of the amount of money disbursed by his Department in the promotion of flying-machine experiments and construction, together with the dates when said disbursements were made and funds from which they were drawn, report as follows:

Inasmuch as the information called for by the resolution is fully set forth on page 6 of the Thirteenth Report of the Board of Ordnance and Fortification, under date of October 1, 1903, the committee recommend that the resolution be laid upon the table.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask in my time that the law be read and then that the report of the Board of Ordnance and Fortification relating to this matter be also read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read as requested.

The Clerk read as follows:

BOARD OF ORDNANCE AND FORTIFICATION.

To enable the Board to make all needful and proper purchases, experiments, and tests to ascertain, with a view to their utilization by the Government, the most effective guns, small arms, cartridges, projectiles, fuses, explosives, torpedoes, armor plates, and other implements and engines of war, and to purchase or cause to be manufactured, under authority of the Secretary of War, such guns, carriages, armor plates, and other war material as may, in the judgment of the Board, be necessary in the proper discharge of the duty devolved upon it by the act approved September 22, 1888; to pay the salary of the civilian member of the Board of Ordnance and Fortification provided by the act of February 24, 1891, and for the necessary traveling expenses of said member when traveling on duty as contemplated in said act; for the payment of the necessary expenses of the Board, including a per diem allowance to each officer detailed to serve thereon, when employed on duty away from his permanent station, of $2.50 a day; and for the test of experimental guns, carriages, and other devices procured in accordance with the recommendation of the Board of Ordnance and Fortification, $100,000, the expenditure of which shall be made by the several bureaus of the War Department heretofore having jurisdiction of the same, or by the Board itself, as the Secretary of War may direct: Provided, That before any money shall be expended in the construction or test of any gun, gun carriage, ammunition, or implements under the supervision of the said Board, the Board shall be satisfied, after due inquiry, that the Government of the United States has a lawful right to use the inventions involved in the construction of such gun, gun carriage, ammunition, or implements, or that the construction or test is made at the request of a person either having such lawful right or authorized to convey the same to the Government.

That all material purchased under the foregoing provisions of this act shall be of American manufacture, except in cases when, in the judgment of the Secretary of War, it is to the manifest interest of the United States to make purchases in limited quantities abroad, which material shall be admitted free of duty.

The Clerk read the following from the Board of Ordnance and Fortification:

THE LANGLEY AERODROME.

Early in the year 1898 a board composed of officers of the Army and Navy was appointed to examine the models and principles of the aerodrome devised by Dr. S. P. Langley, Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, and to report whether or not, in its opinion, a large machine of this design could be built; and if so, whether it would be of practical value.

The report of this board was referred to the Board of Ordnance and Fortification for action, and Doctor Langley was invited to appear before the Board and further explain the proposed construction.

In view of the great utility of such a device, if a practical success, the Board, on November 9, 1898, made an allotment of $25,000 for the construction, development, and test of an aerodrome to be made under the direction of Doctor Langley, with the understanding that an additional allotment of the same amount would be made later. On December 18, 1899, the additional allotment of $25,000 was made.

The construction of the machine was delayed by Doctor Langley's inability to procure a suitable motor, which he was finally obliged to design. The aerodrome was completed about July 15, 1903, and its test is in progress.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that this report furnishes the information desired by the gentleman who introduced the resolution, the Committee on Appropriations recommend that the resolution lie on the table. Years ago there was great complaint that the citizens of the United States, who had some invention that they wanted tested by the Government, could not be recognized; that only army officers and those connected with the Government service had any chance of having their inventions tested. So a new board was created, known as the "Board of Ordnance and Fortification," and a civilian member ordered to that Board, Congress having in view that this civilian member would take care of the rights of the citizen who wanted to have matters tested. A hundred thousand dollars has been set aside each year for the purpose of these investigations. It is evident from the report that this Board first set aside $25,000 for the purpose of investigating flying machines. Later they set aside $25,000 more, the first $25,000 having been expended. That is the history of it, and no doubt the Board acted within the law when they set aside that money for that investigation. Whether or not it was a proper thing to do of course is to be determined by this Board of Ordnance and Fortification. But, as all the information the Department has in regard to the matter is contained in this report, we see no reason why the resolution should not lie on the table.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does this $50,000 which has been set aside from the funds appropriated for ordnance and fortifications represent all the expenditure of Government money for this flying-machine experiment?

Mr. HEMENWAY. It does.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There has been no money taken from other funds?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I understand not. I don't think there is any fund available in the Government.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Now, I am informed from the Smithsonian Institution itself, in an indirect way, that there is an additional $23,000 of money which has been drawn from other funds after the exhaustion of either the first or second appropriation, and I would like to ask the gentleman what objection there can possibly be to getting the fullest information on this subject? This is a problem worse than the problem of Ann's age, and if it is going to cost us $73,000 to construct a mud duck that will not fly 50 feet, how much is it going to cost to construct a real flying machine?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I want to say, leaving out any question about a mud duck, that the twenty-three or twenty-four thousand dollars that has been expended in addition to the Government money is money that in no way belongs to the Government. It is money that belongs to the Smithsonian Institution. When that Institution was founded, Mr. Smithson donated a large sum of money, and from time to time since that citizens of the United States have donated money to the Smithsonian Institution. That money is under the control of the Regents of the Institution. It is not Government money in any sense and the Government has no control whatever over that money. Out of that fund, I understand, some $23,000, or something in that neighborhood, has been expended on this flying machine.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. So that this $23,000 that has been referred to is taken from the appropriation for curios?

Mr. HEMENWAY. It is not an appropriation. The gentleman ought to listen to my answer. It is not an appropriation at all. The Government has no control whatever over the money of the Smithsonian Institution. It is money that belongs to that Institution. It is simply private funds that belong to that Institution and that are controlled by the Regents of that Institution.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. To whom does that Institution belong?

Mr. HEMENWAY. It is the Smithsonian Institution, aided by the Government in many ways, but having a large fund of its own, which the Regents control themselves.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is an institution which belongs to the public, is it not?

Mr. GROSVENOR. No.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Oh, no; the Government aids the Smithsonian Institution in many ways.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is it a private institution?

Mr. HEMENWAY. They have a large fund that is purely a private fund, which has been donated to that institution by private individuals, and that the Government in no way controls except that we, I believe, have something to do with the appointment of the Regents of the Smithsonian Institution. I believe the House appoints three, and those three are now Mr. HITT of Illinois, Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania, and Mr. DINSMORE of Arkansas, Members of this body.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee whether a reasonable amount of time will be allowed to discuss this resolution under the rules? I should like to make a talk on this extravagance.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I will yield the gentleman five minutes' time, if he desires it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I will ask the gentleman for ten minutes.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] for five minutes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. TAWNEY. A parliamentary inquiry. I understand that this is a report that the resolution lie on the table. If it is, I make the point of order that a motion to lay on the table is not debatable.

The SPEAKER. That motion has not yet been entered. The resolution is reported back, and it would require a motion to be entered before a point of order would lie.

Mr. TAWNEY. I understood that the report of the committee was that the resolution do lie on the table, and that has been presented.

The SPEAKER. The report was read within the time of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY], no doubt, for the information of the House; but the reading of the report does not make the motion to lie upon the table. Now, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] is recognized for an hour and has already addressed the House, and from his time yields to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] five minutes. When the gentleman from Indiana or anybody else having the floor, with the right to make a motion to lie upon the table, makes that motion, then that motion is not debatable.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to make the motion until there can be reasonable debate. The gentleman from Nebraska ought to be heard.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK].

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I am unable to understand why a legitimate inquiry for information—detailed information—should be met by these various committees with an effort to keep the information from the House. If there is any possible evil which the newcomer in Washington discovers before he discovers any other, it is the overwhelming and tremendous extravagance of this Government. We are now expending of the people's money over $2,000,000 a day. That is twice as much as was required for the Government expenditures twenty years ago. We are expending this vast sum of money in a time of absolute peace. We are approaching, as the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. HEMENWAY] himself has said, a period in which the national finances will be involved in a large deficit. And yet any effort, however small, to curb extravagance and investigate ridiculous and unwarranted expenditures is met by the leaders on the Republican side of this House with an effort to cut it off and shield the extravagance.

I realize, Mr. Speaker, that Professor Langley, Curator of the Smithsonian Institution, is a learned man. He is erudite in scientific matters. He knows a vast amount about extinct animals and stuffed birds. He is at home with the Pterodactyl ornithostoma, and for such reasons he has a valuable part in the work of the Institution. But I see no reason, and the taxpayers of the country can see no reason, Mr. Speaker, why at national expense he should be constituted and established a modern Darius Green. Certainly the traditional Darius Green met with no more complete failure in his attempted flight from the New England barn than this modern imitator at national expense has attained.

There is a reason, Mr. Speaker, for economy in our national finances which does not apply to expenditures in this country with the same force. It is because our national revenues are derived from the people not in proportion to their ability to pay, not in proportion to the benefits which they derive from this National Government, but practically on the basis of a per capita tax. The poor man with a family of ten persons pays much more national taxation than the wealthy bachelor. Our national laws lay no taxes on wealth. The great accumulations of wealth make no contributions to our national revenues.

Our national finances are organized altogether upon the theory of taxing the consumer. He bears the burden. Even the income tax, passed by a Democratic Congress, was killed by the Supreme Court.

This is the fact. It is a bad system. It puts the burdens of government on the people without any regard to their ability to pay. This being so, the least we can do is not to squander the money. This vast revenue taken from the people at the rate of $2,000,000 a day should be regarded as a trust fund, and the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations owes it to the people to see that all these ridiculous fads and foibles, these experiments and wastes of public money, are checked and stopped. It is not the duty of the chairman of that committee, or any other chairman, when an inquiry is proposed seeking information as to how much is being expended, to interpose objections and obstacles. He refers to some vague and incomplete report which I have never seen and which was made last year, but not to this House nor in any detail. That report should come to this House, and we should know when and how much money was expended in this matter.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I realize that it is not possible to get this information if the chairman of the committee refuses to give us his aid. I realize my unpopular position in Washington. I realize fully that in coming here as an advocate of economy in national affairs I expose myself to attack. As the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads said yesterday, I "incur mere notoriety." I know that a demand for economy is not the path to popularity in Washington.

But I tell you gentlemen on the Republican side that in the next campaign, the campaign that we are approaching, you will find the Democratic party appealing to the people of the country on several vital issues. One of the most important and incontrovertible influences for Democratic success will be the charge that you have been running this Government into a degree of extravagance unheard of in the history of the world. Compared to other great nations of the world, you have made ours reckless and wasteful. You have squandered the people's money, and the party in power at the present time is charged with full responsibility. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] to yield me ten minutes.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I wish the gentleman would take his time when we come to the urgent deficiency bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. It will not take any more time now, and I hope the gentleman will not interpose objection.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I should like to dispose of this matter and get to the urgent deficiency bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I think the gentleman recognizes that this is not going to precipitate any considerable debate. I think that my remarks will practically be all there is of discussion.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Well, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, evidence is multiplying daily to show that every plan proposed for the expenditure of money, though it be fantastic and extravagant, receives support from some officer, bureau, or department, and we must design means to restrain impetuosity and curb this lavish waste. No extravagant scheme should be ventured on by a board or bureau till expressly sanctioned by Congress.

The chairman of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, Mr. GROSVENOR, of Ohio, in his recent report, said:

> There is no legitimate expenditure possible within the wide scope of national jurisdiction that the American people do not rush lavishly into, even to the extent of promoting experiments in aerial navigation.

This, I think, is diplomatic censure of extravagance where found, and intended for the officers who represent and should stand for the people, and does not imply that the people approve it.

The gentleman stands afar off and points in the right direction of the target and hits around its edges. He is a prominent actor in the shooting match and a friend of the proprietors of the show. Some of the owners are not vigilant, others are sleeping, but he hesitates to ring the gong to wake them up. I am a little closer than my friend, and will try to hit the bull's-eye if I can.

We should strike directly at that queer scheme of aerial navigation whereby a scientific promoter, encouraged by executive officers, if not by Congress, raised the high expectation of the public and his demands for money, only to have the venture fall flat and the money sunk at the first opportunity to test his apparatus. We should stay the hand of wasteful adventure and strike down such costly bubbles as Langley's air ships and air castles and rescue the innocent public from such dreams.

I would do the professor no injustice. I admit his ability and power, but I do not concede it in the field of aerial navigation, but in the domain of hypnotism, and to that stands as a shining mark his ability to get many thousands of dollars from officers not in the care of their friends, not under charges, in high official position, or from their subordinates, who should be men of sound business wisdom. Such he influenced in his aerodrome device, so visionary that to the ordinary mind it would seem that wisdom would have shown its futility.

Congress must protect itself or be charged with the folly. If Congress pass appropriaton bills in general language and executive officers pursue this course, there is no protection against any Don Quixote extravagances that belong to the realms of fable or fiction.

In the language of the last fortification appropriation bill—and it was not broader or more limited than the act of September, 1888, creating the Board of Ordnance and Fortification, which spends this money—we provided for "investigations, experiments, and tests," and used the words "other implements and engines of war." Within these words is the only authority for this reckless expenditure. Is Langley's air ship an "implement" or "engine of war?" I think not. Did the experts think so? I would not so charge them. A regiment of them would not conquer the Fiji Islands, except, perhaps, by scaring their people to death.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Does the gentleman say that an effective air ship would not be an instrument of war?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I say that Langley's air ship is not an instrument of war.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Not Langley's air ship, but an effective air ship.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I am referring to this particular one.

Mr. HEMENWAY. If they could sail up over the enemy's camp and see what he had there in the way of men and fortifications, and ascertain all about him, and still be out of danger themselves, that would be an instrument of war that would be more valuable and more formidable than any that the world has ever yet seen.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I am sure that the gentleman will never see any such thing done by Langley's air ship. We must stop this or some bureau under the guide of some professor will be projecting a railroad to the moon.

If we do not, who can tell how soon some one will influence some Department to test the principle of erecting buildings beginning with the roof, with no foundation; who knows how soon some scientist will be promoting with Government aid a plan to feed spiders on glue and bluebottle flies to make it weave a fabric of strength and color; who knows but that some dreamer will be encouraged to test the efficacy of hermetically sealing up hot air in bottles in summer to let it loose in cold, inclement weather?

We should frame our appropriation bills so that unsuspecting Government officials susceptible to hypnotic influence of scientific dreamers may not be led away. Give them a Congressional jolt to awaken them from the spell cast by impractical scientific enthusiasts, to disenchant them, to the end that the public shall be protected, that the Government pay roll shall not open to dreamers, and to emphasize that official position is not a "private snap," that the avenues to the Treasury shall not open to scientific explorers or exploiters either of the earth or heavens, except as the public needs require it.

Is the Board of Ordnance and Fortification by its adventures to become known as holding out invitation to those who honestly believe that the world owes them a living and who can not make connection to get it outside of Government shelter? This Board is a creation of Congress sixteen years old. It has been fed by blanket appropriations. We are warned to be specific.

What became of Langley's air-ship plan that cost so much money? It was referred to the Board and the public knows the result.

At the breaking out of the Spanish war a gentleman wrote to me that he had an idea that he thought humanitarian and that would tend to shorten hostilities. He had great confidence in the War Department, but he was desirous of securing credit if his plan was adopted. It was for our soldiers to carry with them metal plates, highly polished, or mirrors, and reflect the sun in the eyes of the enemy on the firing line.

I did not at that time know that this Board was investigating these subjects, and I responded to him that I had perfect confidence in the War Department, as he could have. I never heard that his matter was a subject of investigation or expense; but I make no complaint, not even though there may have been a discrimination in favor of Langley's project.

I have no disposition to criticise Professor Langley or his scientific theory, except in the manner he scored every other plan of aerial navigation. He was caustic and unsparing. What became of the pet hobby of the scientific specialist? He fitted up his ship with great secrecy, and withal elaborately and at great expense; it was well oiled and polished; in all its appointments it was delicately balanced; in all its mechanism it was measured to the scientific scale; it was prepared for flight, resting on terra firma on an ark of safety, head forward, and overlooking the Potomac River; external force was applied to give it momentum, and it started on its flight in the air over the river; it flew 2 or 3 inches beyond its base (there is some dispute as to the distance), and leaving its firm base it gravitated straight down to the earth in the bottom of the river.

There it lay, a jumble of tangled wreckage; a tangled mass that looked like old scrap iron; a mixed assortment of wings and tails and fans; a tangled mass of scientific destruction, swept by the sleepy tide of the Potomac, resting in its watery grave, a monument—to Langley and of administrative folly. This fruit of "investigation, experiments, and tests" of "implements and engines of war" did not have the virtue of a flying machine invented centuries ago. When the promoter of that took his position on a promontory over a river and jumped off, flopping his wings, he fell into the water, but it was found that the wings that would not sustain him in the air saved him from drowning when he reached the river.

Langley's last and final collapse almost resulted in the death of Mr. Manly, and this misfortune was only averted by the vigilant newspaper correspondents, who had waited so long in their boats for the final test that, according to the press accounts, their beards had grown long and shaggy.

This was the end of the scientific exploration, but the absurd development of this impractical theory had been going on for years, and was on the Government pay roll, wasting thousands of dollars in salary fund and for experimentation. Obstacles, failure, and collapse only seemed to sharpen the appetite for more money.

Is it not time for Congressional dissent? The last army fortification bill, following former acts, provided "that before any money shall be expended in the construction or test of * * * implements * * * the board shall be satisfied after due inquiry that the Government of the United States has a lawful right to use the inventions." Did the War Department think that this was an invention? Charity forbids that thought.

The published accounts state that all devices claimed as inventions are not necessarily such; that the Patent Office drew the line on a freak invention claimed, and refused a patent to one who claimed the priority of right in the scheme of drawing a chalk line around a molasses barrel to keep ants from walking up.

What we are interested in now is, who is responsible for this folly? Is Congress? Will not some Member having the appropriation bill in hand tell us? Can he not make it clear that Congress never authorized the propagation of such vagaries by showing that it was a misconstruction or a violent abuse of discretion that caused it? This must be done or Congress stands charged with the abuse.

One good will come from investigation and explanation. It will open light on how far Congress has been misled, how far misconstruction of our acts and appropriations have obtained in this and other Departments of the Government. I think we can clear our skirts and show that the offices and bureaus and Departments alone are responsible, and we should be swift to apply the remedy.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, the question before the House is on the resolution of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]. His resolution requests certain information. The Committee on Appropriations report back the resolution with the recommendation that it lie on the table, for the reason that the information requested by him is given in a report which has been read at the Clerk's desk and given exactly, showing that so much money has been set aside by the Board of Ordnance and Fortification for this purpose; that $25,000 was first set aside; that that sum has been expended; that $25,000 more was set aside, and that that sum has been partially expended.

It further develops that from the funds of the Smithsonian Institution some $23,000 has been expended. So that gives the information that the gentleman from Nebraska sought to secure, and there is no occasion for the resolution being sent to any of the Departments of the Government, and no reason why the resolution should not lie upon the table.

Now as to the merits. If you read the records of Congress you will find that years ago, between 6 o'clock and 12 o'clock one night, when it was said that a telegraph line could be constructed, and that we could send messages by wire from here to Baltimore, many men in this House got up and laughed at the idea and said it was a ridiculous waste of public money to appropriate anything for that purpose. Yet the appropriation was made, and we not only send telegrams by wire to Baltimore but we can send them all over the world.

When the telephone was proposed they said you could not talk from here to some one in New York; yet they are talking to-day from New York to Nebraska through the telephone. When investigations of this kind are being made we always find gentlemen who come here and say these things are impossible.

The sole question before the House now is to secure the information requested by the gentleman in his resolution. That information has been furnished and placed before the House. That is all we are determining on this vote. It is not a question whether money ought or ought not to be expended for flying machines. That question is not here.

The sole question is, Has the information requested by the resolution been furnished? It has been furnished in the report that has been read to the House, and there is nothing else to do with the resolution but to lay it on the table. Therefore I move, Mr. Speaker, that the resolution of the gentleman from Nebraska be laid on the table.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I do not care to yield now. The gentleman has had his time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana moves to lay the resolution on the table.

The question was taken, and the resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the urgent deficiency bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 10954.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. TAWNEY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10954.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield twenty minutes to my colleague on the committee [Mr. BURKETT].

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. Chairman, on last evening we all went home late to dinner. The Journal, as just read, shows that we did not adjourn until 5.47. We remained here, all of us, long after the usual hour of adjournment, weary as we were and hungry, listening to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], the distinguished leader of the Democracy of the House and the leader of the Democratic party of the United States.

You upon that side of the aisle were anxious to hear what was to be inscribed upon your banner in the coming campaign, anxiously longing that he might drop out some keynote and give to you perhaps the paramount issue, as it were, and with it some hope for the campaign before you. We upon this side of the House were anxious to know what excuse there might be for the longer existence of the Democratic party.

I want to say, in beginning, to our Democratic friends that I have always had a good deal of deference for a Democrat, individually speaking; I have always believed that a Democrat was as honest and as courageous and as patriotic as anybody else. I have always conceded to the Democrats, individually, that they were just as devoted to humanity, their flag, and their country as anybody else; but I have always believed, as I believe to-day, and my belief grows stronger every time I hear a speech on that side of the House, that the Democratic party is absolutely wrong upon every question of government in this country; and from all I can observe there is no hope for anything better from it in the future.

Now, the discussion yesterday suggested to me to make a few remarks, and I may say that I had not asked for any time and did not expect until last night, in fact, that I should speak.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL] asked the gentleman from Mississippi, the leader of the Democratic party, the direct question: "Are you or are you not in favor of the free coinage of silver?" It should have required but one word to answer. The gentleman from Mississippi said he would answer frankly, and then he took fourteen minutes and thirty-seven seconds of time to do it [laughter], and said what will be a column of the RECORD in that "frank expression" of his position. And when he got through there was not a man in the House who knew any better than he did when he began where he stood and where the Democratic party was going to stand on the free coinage of silver, and the RECORD will show that there was loud applause on the Democratic side of the House. [Laughter.]

Now, let me say to the Democratic party: Do any of you know where you stand upon the silver question? Do you know where you stand upon the revenue question of this country—whether you are going to be for free trade or for revenue tariff or for a moderate reduction of the present tariff system? I will tell you when you will answer that question directly—after the convention meets at St. Louis on the 6th day of next July. Then we will all know where the Democratic party will stand so far as this campaign is concerned—when you find out whether my distinguished constituent from Nebraska is going to lead the hosts of the Democracy and control that convention or whether the reorganizers of your party are going to control and repudiate everything you have stood for in past campaigns.

Mr. THAYER. We understand what we are doing now.

Mr. BURKETT. I undertake to say that there is not a Democrat in the House who knows whether he is going to talk for free silver or for the gold standard after the coming St. Louis convention. There is not one of you that knows whether you will talk for free trade or for revenue tariff or whether in accord with the doctrines of a distinguished gentleman from the State of Maryland, who says, I believe, that the Democratic party only wants to revise in a very limited degree the present revenue system.

Mr. BENNY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from New Jersey?

Mr. BURKETT. I do.

Mr. BENNY. Did the Republican party in 1896 know where it was going to stand on that question until it was told by TOM PLATT, who told them after the convention was assembled?

Mr. BURKETT. I do not know what the gentleman knew about what TOM PLATT told the convention of 1896; so far as the gentleman who is talking is concerned he knew very well where he would stand and where the Republican party of Nebraska would stand a good many months before the convention of 1896. [Applause.] I will say to the gentleman that the Republican party of Nebraska had crossed that bridge so far as they and their platform were concerned many weeks ahead of the suggested direction of THOMAS PLATT, of New York, or of any other gentleman.

Mr. BAKER. Will the gentleman yield to another question?

Mr. BURKETT. Yes.

Mr. BAKER. Do I understand the gentleman to say now that the Republican party in the next campaign is going to declare for a vigorous criminal prosecution of the officials of the trusts which have violated the Sherman antitrust law?

Mr. BURKETT. I will say to the gentleman that nobody ever doubts, as I will undertake to show before I get through, where the Republican party stands at all times on all questions, and let me say further to the gentleman that every law that was ever put upon the statute books of the United States for the suppression of capitalistic greed was placed there by the Republican party against the combined opposition of Democracy. [Applause.] And further let me say that every single law that has ever been enforced has been enforced by the Republican Administrations of this country.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. BURKETT. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I have heard the statement made so repeatedly that what is known as the Sherman antitrust law is a production of the Republican party that I want to ask the gentleman from Nebraska if it is not a fact that in the United States Senate, when that issue was pending before that body, the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin, Mr. SPOONER, declared that Senator Vest, of Missouri, had more to do with the framing of that act than any other one man in either branch of Congress?

Mr. BURKETT. Let me say to the gentleman now I do not know what that has got to do with my speech or what that has got to do——

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. The gentleman from Nebraska is claiming all the credit for the Republican party for antitrust legislation. That's what it has to do with it.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Nebraska yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. BURKETT. I would like to get through with one of these men at a time.

Mr. COCHRAN. The gentleman looked so complacent that I thought he had got through with the whole earth.

Mr. BURKETT. Go ahead, then, and ask your question.

Mr. COCHRAN. You say the Nebraska Republicans had solved the financial problem and had taken their position in favor of the gold standard long before the convention——

Mr. BURKETT. Before the St. Louis convention.

Mr. COCHRAN. Was that about the time the late President McKinley made his famous swing around the circle and made silver speeches all over Ohio——

Mr. BURKETT. I did not hear him in Ohio, but Major McKinley made no silver speeches in Nebraska.

Mr. COCHRAN. You only know what took place in Nebraska?

Mr. BURKETT. Let me say to the gentleman I have read every speech of his that the Democratic party circulated in the campaign of 1896, and I defy anybody on the Democratic side to get up and say that President McKinley ever advocated the unlimited free coinage of silver in the sense that the Democratic party did in that campaign, or that Blaine did, or any of the rest of the list of great statesmen whose speeches you circulated in your effort to show that they at some time had stood for free silver.

Mr. COCHRAN. But did they advocate the gold standard prior to 1896?

Mr. BURKETT. There was no particular contest on that subject prior to 1896.

Mr. COCHRAN. Did you ever hear of any political party in this country framing a platform declaring in favor of the gold standard prior to 1896?

Mr. BURKETT. Let me say to the gentleman from Missouri that that is a question that has been thrust at us a good many times. I have heard you upon that side say a good many times that the Republican party was the first party that ever dared to advocate the "pernicious gold standard." Let me say to the gentleman, I thank God it was.

The Republican party has been the first party that has dared to advocate a good many things in this country against the opposition of Democracy. The Republican party was the first party that ever dared to say 4,000,000 black men should no longer be slaves in this country, and that they would go to war, if necessary, to carry out that position.

The Republican party was the first party that ever dared to advocate cheap postage in this country and free homesteads. They were the first who dared to advocate the resumption of specie payment, and we have had them all because the Republican party had the nerve to declare for them. All along the line the history of the Republican party shows that it has been the party that has taken the lead in the progress, the development, and the upbuilding of this country against the opposition of the Democracy of the United States. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. COCHRAN. The gentleman has had fourteen minutes and thirty-seven seconds, and he has not answered at all. [Laughter.] I ask you the question again: Is it not true that every party, Republicans, Democrats, Populists, Greenbackers, Prohibitionists, and every political party in this country prior to 1896, had made solemn declarations in favor of the coinage of silver?

Mr. BURKETT. The Republican party never, in any platform, in any convention, either State or national or county, so far as I know, not even in Missouri, advocated the free and unlimited coinage of silver.

Mr. COCHRAN. In 1892 did not the platform adopted at Minneapolis merely becloud the subject and carry the impression that it was in favor of it, and did not the orators on the stump claim that they were more in favor of silver coinage than the Democrats?

Mr. BURKETT. So far as the records of the parties go, the Republican platform was almost as clear as the platform of the Democratic party. The gentleman must recognize this, that in the campaign of 1892 neither your party nor the Republican party made any issue at all upon the money question. You went before the country on an entirely different issue. The question was not raised, and perhaps not one man in ten heard the money question spoken of in 1892.

Mr. COCHRAN. Did not whole State delegations—notably the California delegation—go to St. Louis on a special train, bearing on it a pledge of the party to the unlimited coinage of silver and gold?

Mr. BURKETT. That I do not know, for I did not see the train.

Mr. COCHRAN. Now, then——

Mr. THAYER rose.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that there are so many wanting to interrupt me, and they can not determine among themselves who shall be recognized, I decline to yield further.

Mr. THAYER. The question that I want to ask the gentleman, and the question to which I think the country wants an answer, is, Do you propose to go back to 1896 for your issues, or do you propose to face the conditions of 1904?

Mr. BURKETT. Let me say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that the Republican party never looks backward upon any question at any time or on anything. [Applause on Republican side.] The Republican party will keep its face to the front. It will handle the issues in the campaign of 1904, as it has handled them in the past, for the best interests of all the people of the whole country.

Now, let me go on, for I do not know but that my speech may be "deflected," to use the term of the gentleman from Mississippi. I will say in response to the gentleman from Massachusetts that there is no probability of our discussing 1896 issues this year. The Democratic party never stood still that long upon any question. You will have to have a different issue than you have ever had before if you expect to establish yourselves in the confidence of the American people. And I do not blame the gentleman for wanting to get away from 1896.

Now, this calls to my mind the fact that every four years, and sometimes oftener in the past, our Democratic friends have had to change their paramount issue and have a new excuse for existing longer as a party.

We Republicans are never in that unfortunate condition. Our positions and our policies are enduring.

I remember the first time I ran for Congress, in 1898, the paramount issue of your party out in my district was the McCleary bill. I do not know whether any of you had to run up against it or not. Probably it was a good bill, for it bore the name of my distinguished colleague and coworker in the committee from Minnesota. I never happened to hear particularly about that bill until some gentleman came from the East and declared it was the paramount issue. For sixty days we had to go over the district talking about the McCleary bill, and nobody has ever heard of it since. In 1896 the paramount issue of the Democratic party was "the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, without the aid or consent of any other nation on earth." There is not one of you who can say that as smoothly as I did.

You have not tried it since 1896, yet in 1896 every Democrat of you was authority on 16 to 1. You went out of that convention in Chicago, every mother's son of you, and you got a piece of white metal sixteen times as big as a piece of brass, and you hung it on your coat lapel and strutted up and down the streets and the lanes of this country swearing you stood for 16 to 1 or bust, and every one of you busted. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Now, let us go back further, as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] said, to 1892. Your paramount issue then was free trade. When Garfield was the candidate, it was the force bill. When Hayes was the candidate you said if he was elected he was going to turn the temples of liberty over into the hands of the money changers, or something of that kind. When Grant was a candidate it was militarism, and when Lincoln was a candidate it was imperialism. Every four years you have had a new paramount issue.

Now, this is the question that confronts us, and it confronts the people, and that embarrasses the Democracy of the country. Why is it that every four years you have not only got to have a paramount issue, a new excuse for nominating candidates, but in no two successive campaigns have you ever dared to take the same position that you took in the previous campaign upon any question?

Now let us go back, if the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] will, to that campaign of 1896 and see why and whither comes these divers and sundry paramount issues. When that convention met in Chicago in 1896 there was not a Democrat here that had any idea that they could nominate a candidate for President with any hope of electing him. We had had four years of Democracy in this country, four years of free trade. We had had four years of the hardest times that the American people had ever gone through, and I pray God that we will never be called upon to go through four more such years as we went through from 1892 to 1896. When your convention met in 1896 not one of you thought it was worth while to nominate a candidate for President. From that convention came forth the proposition of the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, etc. You went before the people, and I must say you made considerable stir.

Now, I am going to make a confession. I never wonder why so many people voted for free silver when I think of the conditions of those times and the environments. There are three things in connection with that campaign of 1896 that, when I think of them, I never wonder why so many people voted for free silver. When I think of the conditions of those times, when I think of the abuse that a man had to go through in 1896 if he advocated the gold standard, and, further, when I think of the prophecies and the predictions and the promises that your party made in 1896, every single one of which you would be ashamed to make to-day, I do not wonder that so many people were misled in the campaign as there were, and let me say right now in the beginning that of all the speeches that you all made there is not one of you that dares stand up on the floor to-day and make the speech as you made it in 1896.

There is not one of you who will dare to stand up in this House or stand up on a platform before enlightened American citizens in all the length and breadth of this land and make the arguments and prophecies and promises and predictions that you made in 1896. Think of the conditions of those times. You remember how hard times were. You know of the want and hunger and idleness of those four dark years. I remember that old story that had not been used, as campaigners told me, since Buchanan's time, but which was gotten out and used at that time—that old story of a man shearing his sheep. I think the story must have come from Missouri or from Ohio, because we did not have any sheep out our way at that early day. This man said that when he thought how low the price of sheep was and how cheap wool was he never dared shear a sheep in those Democratic days in the old accustomed way, by shearing it from the head toward the tail; but he grabbed the sheep by the tail and sheared him toward his head, because he was ashamed to look a sheep in the face. [Laughter.]

I remember the great armies of American laboring men all over this country that were marching on to Washington. I was not here at the time, but I remember the great armies under Kelley and Coxey and their captains and colonels and lieutenants that gathered from all over this country and marched on to Washington. They came from the Rocky Mountains and the Alleghenies, from the North and South. They passed through the town I live in, as they passed through the towns that every one of you lives in. They came here to Washington, and some people called them hoboes. But they were not. They were loyal, patriotic, and industrious American citizens, who with all their brain and all their brawn and muscle could not find work enough to do in this country to employ their hands with which to furnish the necessaries of life for the wives and children they had sworn to protect at home. They came here to Washington. They never asked Uncle Sam for a dollar, not one. What was it they asked? What was their petition? It was this:

"Uncle Sam, here we are, your children, 3,000,000 of us, idle American laboring men, who are walking the streets by day in search of work and are following our shadows home at night to a crust of bread and a pallet of straw. Here we are, Uncle Sam.

"We want you—the United States Government—to undertake some great public work; we want you to dig canals, to build highways; we want you to do something or other that will give our idle hands employment."

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HEMENWAY. I yield the gentleman sufficient additional time to continue his remarks.

Mr. BURKETT. I am sorry I have overrun my time; but it was not altogether my fault. I did not seem to be able to control that matter.

That was the condition that confronted the people at that time—in 1896.

Another thing. A man could not advocate the gold standard in 1896 without being abused. It took nerve to be a Republican in 1896. You could not go down the streets of this town or the different towns in your districts throughout the length and breadth of the land without being abused; without being called a "Hannacrat," a "goldbug;" without being accused of trying to get your feet on the neck of the "poor, helpless people," as they said, and stamp the life right out of them. It took nerve in 1896 to be a Republican as was never before required of men in civil affairs.

One other thing in passing. I do not know that I have the ammunition here to-day for all that I should like to say, but the trend that the earlier part of this debate has taken leads me to go into this point. You remember that in 1896 you people went into the field of prophecy; you prophesied what was going to happen. You said that if the people did not vote for the free and unlimited coinage of silver terrible things would happen. Now, there is not one of you who to-day would stand up before an intelligent audience and say those same things over again.

I have not here all the matter to which I should like to refer, but fortunately I happen to have at hand some memoranda showing some of the things which were said at that time by your great, peerless leader, and I am going to read some of these things. As I read them I want to see whether any of you will stand up and affirm that any of the dreadful things that were then predicted to happen have occurred in any alarming extent.

Soon after the campaign of 1896 was over Mr. Bryan wrote a book, and he collected together in that book the speeches he had made in that hippodrome chase over the country for election to the Presidency. The book has his name on the title page, so we may be sure that it is authoritative as to what he said.

I have not that book here. If I had known the turn which this debate would take, I would have brought here the original document. But I have here, luckily, some extracts from that publication of Mr. Bryan, and I have the pages noted, so that the quotations which I make may readily be verified. I repeat, as I read these predictions, if any of you are ready to say that any of these predictions have proved correct, I should be glad to have you stand up and say so. When Mr. Bryan was saying these things in that campaign, every one of you were repeating them; every one of you insisted that what he said was true; every one of you was ready to bow down at his altar and worship.

Among the things which Mr. Bryan said, and which I ask you now particularly to notice, was this:

If you elect the gold-standard candidate, it will increase the purchasing power of a dollar and make falling prices.
It will increase the debts of the people, lessen ability to pay debts, make hard times.

In another speech he said:

If you elect the gold-standard candidate, it will starve everybody but the money changers.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], in his remarks yesterday not only continued in that same miserable strain of prophecy but he said, if I remember rightly—unfortunately for me his speech is not in the RECORD, but if I misquote him he will be good enough to say so—he said the Republican party was now continuing the process as it had in the past, continuing more and more to starve the people of this country.

Now, as I heard the gentleman from Mississippi say that, I remembered the statement of Mr. Bryan four years ago—the statement which he then proclaimed all over this country. Now, either it was not true, as Mr. Bryan said, that if the people elected the gold-standard candidate they would starve everybody but the money changers, or else all the people of this country have become money changers; for our people, all of them, all classes and everywhere, are the slickest, fattest, most prosperous people of all the world and of all times.

Now, I quote from page 485 of this book:

If you elect the gold-standard candidate it will take the bread out of one man's mouth and put it into another man's mouth.

Think of it! What a pathetic thing! A regular surgical operation! [Laughter.] Do you wonder that so many people voted for Mr. Bryan in 1896, when you recall the predictions and prophecies which were then made?

If you elect the gold-standard candidate it will make the rich richer and the poor poorer, decrease happiness, increase distress, destroy opportunity to work.

There is where they almost caught me. I always like to work; and when I read that declaration that if the gold-standard candidate was elected "it would destroy opportunity to work," I must say it almost caught me.

Now, I read from page 540:

If you elect the gold-standard candidate it will encourage hoarding of money.

In other speeches such statements as these were made: The election of the gold-standard candidates will—

Ruin the farmer.
Injure the wage-earner.
Reduce employment.
Discourage enterprise.
Paralyze industry.
Bust the savings banks.
Ruin the depositor.
Decrease salaries.
Destroy manufactures.
Make impossible for husbands and wives to pay mortgages.
Close public schools.
Make dearer money.
Cheaper property.
Harder times.
More crime.

Yet McKinley was elected, and we adopted the gold standard, and not a single prophecy or prediction of our opponents has come true.

Why, I remember within six months after that campaign corn went up out in Nebraska, and our opposition friends still denied that we had any prosperity. Corn went up more, and then the Democrats said, "Why, certainly corn has gone up, but don't you know they have a famine over in Europe somewhere, and that is what has made corn go up?" Then horses went up, and they said, "That is because horseflesh is used as meat, and it has found a new market." But the people of this country do not eat mules, so mules went up, and kicked the wind out of their argument. Apparently everything in this country went up except free silver, and I might add Cervera's fleet.

Mr. BENNY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BURKETT. Yes; certainly.

Mr. BENNY. Do you believe that the rich have grown richer and the poor have grown poorer, or not?

Mr. BURKETT. I do not believe it. I believe they have all grown richer. I believe the rich have grown richer and the poor have grown richer, too. The whole country has grown richer.

Mr. SCUDDER. In equal proportion?

Mr. BURKETT. The gentleman knows that could not be true. They should grow richer in the same ratio, but not in equal amounts. The man who starts out with twice the advantage is certain to grow rich faster than the other man.

Now, I want to follow this thing up. Four years later the Democratic party met in Kansas City. The people of this country understood free trade after the campaign of 1892. They understood free silver after the campaign of 1896, and when your convention met in Kansas City you had to have a new issue, a new excuse for going before the American people. I will tell you why.

Every one of you can remember when you were a boy and your mother washed and dressed you and kissed you good-by and started you to school, and instead of going to school you went fishing or swimming. Then, do you remember that when you appeared in school the teacher called you up in front and wanted to know why you had been late or absent? Do you remember that? You gave her some kind of an excuse. You got caught the second morning if you gave the same excuse. So you never offered her the same excuse the third morning, after you had been caught. The Democratic party in this country got caught on free trade in 1892. You got caught on free silver in 1896, and just ordinary schoolboy common sense told you to get a new excuse.

Now, when you went into that convention in Kansas City you adopted free silver, it is true, but you proceeded from that moment absolutely to refuse to say a word upon the money question throughout all that campaign. You did adopt free silver, but you had to go away out into the Pacific Ocean, two or three thousand miles away from home, to get the deciding vote that put that money plank into your platform. Why? Had you changed your judgment on it? Had your consciences had an awakening in the meantime? Did you know more than you did four years ago? That was not the proposition. You had been defeated on that issue four years before, and you did not have the nerve, so far as the Democratic party on the continent—in the United States—was concerned, you did not have the courage, you did not have the faith in your convictions of 1896 to put them into your platform, and if it had not been for that delegate from Hawaii you never would have referred to free silver in 1900 even in your platform.

Mr. SCUDDER. Is not that one of the misfortunes of expansion?

Mr. BURKETT. That may be true to your party. But you did not stop there. I will tell you what your paramount issue was then. Your paramount issue was then, as you brought it out there, three things, if I remember right: Imperialism, militarism, and trusts—triplets of the political family of graveyard walkers, imaginary horrors, reared at that time, for what? To cover up the egregious blunders of the past, to make the American people forget, if it was possible, your false argument on free trade in 1892, and your ridiculous prophesies on free silver in 1896.

Mr. SCUDDER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BURKETT. Yes.

Mr. SCUDDER. Does the gentleman contend that the trust issue is an imaginary issue at this time?

Mr. BURKETT. It will be an imaginary issue so far as the Democratic party is concerned, I am quite confident of that. It always has been imaginary, so far as the Democratic party was concerned.

Mr. THAYER. And so far as the Republican party has been concerned, too.

Mr. BURKETT. It has not been in the past.

Mr. SCUDDER. How much of the appropriation of $500,000 is it understood they have expended for executing the laws against trusts?

Mr. BURKETT. I will say to the gentleman that the expenditure of money is not necessarily a measure of the degree of the enforcement of the laws so far as the Republican party is concerned.

Mr. SCUDDER. The President asked for it, and said it was essential.

Mr. BURKETT. He spent all that was necessary.

Mr. SCUDDER. Twenty-five thousand dollars. Does the gentleman think that is sufficient to suppress the trusts?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. That was $25,000 more than the Democratic party expended for the same purpose.

Mr. BURKETT. Now, I am not going into a trust speech today. It has been heretofore handled by those who sat in this House at the time the Democratic party had complete power, and they certainly have shown that the Democratic party can take unto themselves no particular glory for what they did in reference to the trust matter during the time they were in control of this Government. So far as the people of this country are concerned, they have never had any more confidence in your party to deal with the trust question successfully than they have upon any other question that has come before them to determine.

Mr. DALZELL. Will the gentleman allow me a suggestion?

Mr. BURKETT. Certainly.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Bryan says that the Democratic Administration, the only Democratic Administration we know anything about, was the most plutocratic that this Government ever knew [laughter and applause on the Republican side], and that the party spent a million dollars in the States of New York and New Jersey in order to put that plutocratic party into power.

Mr. CAMPBELL. And got that out of Wall street.

Mr. BARTLETT. And that was not as plutocratic as the Republican party.

Mr. SCUDDER. I was going to say, in answer to the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that it would seem, judging from the applause in the House, that Mr. Bryan has to look to the Republican party just now for his support. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BURKETT. I want to take up this discussion where the gentleman from Mississippi left it yesterday.

After the gentleman from Illinois had gone from Missouri clear around through Texas and Alabama to the Atlantic Ocean with his newspaper clippings, singing as they did the great battle hymn of the Republican party, "Good times and good cheer and prosperity," the gentleman from Mississippi arose at that point to interject into the debate what we all expected to be the paramount issue of the Democratic party for the coming campaign. But we were all disappointed. He only scolded. There is not a man on that side of the House but knows that every paper published in his district is teeming to-day with statements of the great prosperity that the people are enjoying.

The people never were so well fed, so well clothed, and so well housed as during this series of Republican years. There never was a time in the history of this country of such prosperity, and those newspapers, as read by the gentleman from Illinois, only confirmed what every one of us know, that there has been universal prosperity since 1897. Now, let me tell you what is going to be the paramount issue in the next campaign.

Mr. SCUDDER. Is that due entirely to the Republican party or has God Almighty had something to do with that prosperity?

Mr. BURKETT. Now, let me answer that, and also answer the question whether or not God Almighty or the Republican party is responsible for the boll weevil and for the high price of cotton, which has been asked so many times from that side of the House during this debate. Let me tell the gentleman from New York, and all the rest of you who have asked the question, that I have no hesitancy in saying that the Republican party is not only responsible for the price of cotton, but we are responsible for the fact that the people in New York and all over this country are able to buy cotton at 15 cents a pound, a rate that you have to sell it for to be profitable when the boll weevil has destroyed half of it. We are not responsible for the boll weevil, and we are trying to do with the boll weevil exactly what we have been trying to do with the Democratic party, the chinch bug, and every other pest in this country—we are trying to exterminate it. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BURKETT. I am trying to make my speech, if I am not interrupted.

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not want to interrupt the gentleman, if it is not agreeable to him.

Mr. BURKETT. I yield to the gentleman always.

Mr. BARTLETT. You said the Republican party made the manufacturers in the East able to buy our cotton at 15 cents a pound. Does not the gentleman know it to be a fact that the manufacturers in the South buy as much cotton as the manufacturers of the North, and that we sell three-fourths of our cotton crop abroad?

Mr. BURKETT. Well, let me say to the gentleman from Georgia in that particular that he fails to grasp——

Mr. BARTLETT. That is the truth.

Mr. BURKETT (continuing). He fails to grasp the real position of the Republican party not only upon the proposition of home markets, but on foreign markets as well. We have sold—and the Republicans are glad to admit it—more goods abroad since Major McKinley was made President and the Dingley tariff bill was passed than before in ten times as many years.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman tell this House and the country what tariff there is upon raw cotton that is sold, and which is the chief product of the South, and how the Dingley tariff bill has affected the price of raw cotton——

Mr. SCUDDER. And sold in competition with the pauper labor of China and Manchuria.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman tell me how much that has affected that?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Did I understand the gentleman from Georgia to say that three-fourths of that product of the South is sold abroad?

Mr. BARTLETT. I do; yes, sir.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Will the gentleman tell me how he reconciles that with the Democratic prophecy made when the Dingley tariff bill was up that if we passed that bill it would absolutely destroy our foreign markets? [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not know that anyone ever made such statement, as far as cotton is concerned, for it is not protected by the tariff.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Will the gentleman answer that question? You said we would build a stone wall around America and that we could not sell goods abroad any longer.

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not understand that any such argument was made by anybody.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Now, the gentleman says that three-fourths of our product of cotton is sold abroad.

Mr. BARTLETT. And always has been under all tariffs.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. But they said it would cease if the Dingley bill became a law.

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not know of any man who made any such assertion that I have ever heard of.

Mr. BURKETT. Now, Mr. Chairman, let me take my time and make my speech.

Mr. BARTLETT. I thought I had the gentleman's permission.

Mr. BURKETT. I am always delighted to have the gentleman from Georgia say almost anything to me he feels like saying, as it does him so much good and it does not hurt me. Let me say to the gentleman from Georgia that there is a tariff on some sort of cotton goods; but that is not the proposition——

Mr. BARTLETT. I said raw cotton.

Mr. BURKETT. The Democratic party has taken the position here that because the boll weevil got into the cotton down South and made it scarcer by half that cotton has gone up in price. Now, tell me how high cotton would have gone in 1894 and 1895 and 1896? There was no sale for it then at any price; cheap as it was then it was a drug upon the market. It would not have gone up then under the same circumstances, because there was nobody who had any money to buy cotton with in those days. The laboring men were out of work and business men were out of business.

The prosperity in the cotton industry has been brought about, not by the scarcity of the article increasing the demand, commonly speaking, but through the ability of the people of New England and all over the United States to buy that cotton even at two or three times as high a price as it was during the free-trade times which the gentleman from Georgia is pining to reintroduce into this country. That ability to buy is because the people have all been employed on full time and at good wages, and good times and good wages is a Republican product.

Now, let me get back to my speech. Here is a question that bothers you all: Why is it that every four years you Democrats have to have a new paramount issue? Why is it that the Republican party never changes its paramount issue? The same paramount issue that the Republican party has to-day it had four years ago, it had in 1896, it had when Lincoln was a candidate, and Grant was a candidate, and Garfield was a candidate, and it has had it all along the line. Now, I might go further and say that a Republican never has to change his campaign speech because he always has the same doctrine to talk, he always has the same goal to attain, the same object to accomplish.

It is more embarrassing for you upon that side, for every year you must have a new issue. You never take a position that you can stand by for more than one campaign. On the other hand, we Republicans go tramping along the same old road, going in the same direction, to do the same thing. And the oldest Republican here to-day will bear me out in saying that you are making the same kind of speeches that you made forty years ago.

Mr. SCUDDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURKETT. I wish the gentleman would not inject so many questions, but I will yield for this one.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BURKETT. I can only yield to one at a time. Very well.

Mr. SCUDDER. The same position to do nothing at all to cut off your base of supplies.

Mr. BURKETT. I decline to answer that, Mr. Chairman. I refer the gentleman to the history of this country for the fifty years of Republicanism as an answer as to whether or not we have been a do-nothing party. I suggest that the gentleman read the history of this country for the last half century.

Mr. DINSMORE. Mr. Chairman, I dislike to interrupt the gentleman very much, for he is making a good speech. He was saying that the Republican party is advocating the same principles to-day that they have advocated for years and that he can make the same speech that he has made all the time. I would like to ask him if they are still, as in the platform of 1888, denouncing Grover Cleveland for trying to demonetize silver. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BURKETT. Oh, Mr. Chairman, we have every hope that the Democrats will take care of Grover Cleveland. [Laughter.] Let me say that while your people every four years have had to change your position and have had to have a new issue, the Republican party has never had but one issue, and it will be the same in this campaign. It is the welfare and happiness of the American people, the progress and development of the American nation. [Applause on the Republican side.]

It doesn't make any difference whether free silver shall be acute in the Democratic party at that time, whether free trade shall be acute in the Democratic party, or whether the way we are going to handle the Philippine Islands shall be acute in the Democratic party, or whether Panama shall be acute, the Republican party will keep its face constantly to the front and advocate the one proposition—to do that thing at all times that will bring the greatest happiness to the American people, that will be for the welfare and prosperity of this great American nation. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Here is where the people are interested. Let me tell my friends on the other side that this is what concerns the people of this country, and before you enter upon the coming contest, with your theories and your hackneyed policies, you would do well first to consider how will they affect the welfare and happiness of the American people, the progress and development of the American nation. Only a few years ago you went before the country and stated that the most important question was the way we were going to take care of 5,000,000 people in the Philippine Islands. But the people, by the greatest majority we have ever had, insisted that a more important question to them was the way you were going to take care of 77,000,000 people right here in the United States. That is the question that comes home to every man and will be the paramount issue in the next campaign. When a man goes into the ballot booth to cast his vote he will say, "Which party, which one of these policies, which one of these theories when carried out will be for the highest interest for me and for my wife and for those that I have sworn to take care of at home?" That is the paramount issue of the Republican party, always to do that thing which will make light hearts and happy faces, good homes and pleasant places.

As I said before, everybody in this country wants good times. We are having good times, and the people want to know how long these good times are going to last. Out in eastern Nebraska in 1896 land was worth about $25 an acre and slow sale at any price. To-day you can not buy that land for less than fifty or a hundred dollars an acre. The people want to know how long these good times are going to continue. The people will want to know what assurance you can give them not only that you will continue these conditions, but that you will not visit upon them the same disasters that you did from 1893 to 1896. Let me tell the gentleman from Mississippi the difference between the real conditions and what he appeared to conceive them to be in his argument of yesterday.

Let me tell him how long these good times are going to last, whether his party gets into power or whether my party gets into power. I will tell you when the good times will stop—when we quit doing business on correct business principles. You Democrats never did conduct the affairs of this Government in my judgment, on any strictly business basis. There are two rules for doing business successfully. These two rules, if followed, will make individuals successful and will make a nation prosperous. In my judgment, you never would comply with them in the future, as you never have in the past.

The first of those rules is "spend less than your income." You have to do it as an individual if you expect to get ahead in the world. It makes no difference whether your income is 10 cents a week or 40 cents a minute, you must spend less than your income if you would get rich.

Secondly, if you expect to get on in this world and prosper as an individual you have to "sell more than you buy." You have to do it. You can not buy more than you sell and ever succeed. No farmer could sell $600 worth of corn and buy $700 worth of goods and prosper. Just so is it with national affairs, and no nation will ever prosper that spends more than its income or that sells less than it buys. The trouble with the Democratic party is you don't recognize these rules. You spend more than your income and you buy more than you sell. Let me tell you what you did during the four years of the Administration of Grover Cleveland.

I have here, from the Statistical Abstracts, the receipts and expenditures of this Government during the four years beginning with 1894 and ending in 1897, when the Republican party came into power. I am not going to read them all, but I will put them in the RECORD, with the permission of the House. Let me say that in 1893 we had a surplus of $2,341,674. In 1894 you expended $442,605,759, and your receipts were only $372,802,498. You had a deficiency of $69,803,261. In 1895, the next year, you had a deficiency of $42,805,223. In 1896 you had a deficiency of $25,203,246. In 1897 you had a deficiency of $18,052,454. Every year you had a deficiency in times of profound peace in this country, simply because you spent more than your income.

Mr. MADDOX. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. BURKETT. Well, I should like to have the gentlemen defer for a time, for I wish to finish this matter.

Mr. MADDOX. Will the gentleman just step back now and tell us how much of a surplus Harrison had on hand and how much he expended and how he came out, and whether the Republicans spent more than their income at that time? [Applause on the Democratic side.] When he was inaugurated he had over a hundred millions of dollars in the Treasury, and when he turned the reins of government over to Mr. Cleveland there was not over two millions in the Treasury.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. He paid off two hundred millions of bonds in the meantime.

Mr. PAYNE. He paid off two hundred and sixty-two millions of bonds in the meantime.

Mr. BURKETT. If you will go back and take the North American Review——

Mr. MADDOX. Oh, not the North American Review, but just take the United States Treasurer's reports.

Mr. BURKETT. I hope the gentleman will not get excited. We will try to debate this matter in decorum.

Mr. MADDOX. I want you to take the reports of the Treasury.

Mr. BURKETT. I think the gentleman will take my answer just as I give it, as long as I control the time. If you will go back and read the Forum and the North American Review——

Mr. MADDOX. But let us take the official records.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. Chairman, I wish the Chair would try to keep the gentleman quiet. I am trying to answer all questions with proper decorum and courtesy.

Mr. MADDOX. Oh, I will withdraw the question if it embarrasses the gentleman at all. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BURKETT. No; it does not embarrass me in the slightest.

Mr. MADDOX. I will say that I indorse entirely the gentleman's idea of what the Government should do and what an individual should do, but I want to say to the gentleman that his party has not practiced what he is preaching and that the official records show it.

Mr. BURKETT. Now, let me tell the gentleman there never was an hour from the time that the civil war closed, on an average, down to the beginning of the Administration of Grover Cleveland when the Republican party did not pay off $174,000 of the indebtedness of this country—every blessed hour that you and I have lived since the civil war. [Applause on the Republican side.] They paid that indebtedness because they had a surplus, and they had a surplus only because they did follow those rules. If the gentleman will go back six months previous to the time of the election of Grover Cleveland, he will find the North American Review and the Forum and the financial journals of the country with this sort of articles in them: "What shall we do with the surplus in the United States Treasury?" "What shall we base bank notes upon when the national debt is paid?" That was the problem during all those later years of the Harrison Administration—what was to be done with the enormous surplus that was accumulating in the Treasury? I do not ask the gentleman to take my word, but let him go to the files of the North American Review or any of the great magazines of the country at that time and see for himself.

Grover Cleveland was nominated and he was elected, and between that time and the 4th of March the income of this country was absolutely shut off, and why? Because business stopped. The people of this country understood, or thought they did, at least, the conditions under which they could bring goods into this country as soon as Grover Cleveland should be inaugurated and Democratic policies put into operation, and they absolutely stopped importations into the country, as the records show. As the importations were decreased the revenues were decreased, the surplus decreased, and in that last year, instead of having an enormous surplus, just as we had had every year before, in 1893 our income was cut down to within two and a half millions of our expenses.

It was a close call, I admit, for a Republican Administration, but it was a surplus. It was a pretty thin margin to skate on, but, sirs, thin as it was, close to the line as it was, it was miles and miles better than your sixty-nine millions of deficiency the very next year. Let me go on, and I will tell the gentleman something else along this line of Democratic incompetency.

After you had had control of affairs four years you handed them back to us, glad to escape the responsibility, and the very first thing that the Republican party had to do when it came into power after that Democratic Congress and that Democratic Administration was to appropriate in deficiencies, to pay the debts of this Government that your party did not have the money to pay, to an amount of $347,165,001.82. Not only that, but during those four years you went four times to the money markets of the world and you borrowed $113,000,000, specifically to pay running expenses, and issued bonds for it. You issued more bonds during that time, but this amount is absolutely traceable to running expenses of the Government. In short, you borrowed $113,000,000 on the bonds of the country and three hundred and forty-seven millions on oral account and then left the Treasury empty and official salaries unpaid.

Now, that was the management of the Democratic party during the time they had the reins of government in their hands in this country. Why should we expect you to do better in the future than you have in the past when you adhere to the same old free-trade heresy?

Now let me continue where I left off when interrupted. The last year I gave you was 1897, when you Democrats in time of peace had a deficiency of more than $18,000,000. The next fiscal year, or that of 1898, was the first year under the McKinley Administration. It took us a little while to get our machinery started, and then the Spanish war came upon us, and then the Philippine war, and they made millions of extra expense.

The first year of that Administration, or 1898, we had a deficiency of thirty-eight millions. In 1899 we spent eighty-nine millions more than our income. But there the story changed. In 1900 our surplus was nineteen millions; in 1901 it was seventy-seven millions; in 1902 ninety-one millions, and in 1903 our surplus was fifty-four millions. With that stupendous amount of surplus we have been paying our debts. We always do. That is also Republican policy. When the Republican party turned the Government over into the hands of Democracy in 1893 the public debt, less cash in the Treasury, was exactly $838,969,475.75. When you Democrats went out of office in 1897, after four years of peace, that public debt was $986,656,086.14.

I happen to have here a Treasury statement for September 1 last, and that shows the debt to be only $917,752,545. Thus, since 1897, when we came into power, we have conducted the Spanish war and the Philippine war, have paid every cent of the cost, and have reduced the national debt $68,903,541.14. We have not done it by any legerdemain process, but by following the simple rule of business of spending less than our income.

Receipts and expenditures of the Government from 1893 to 1903.

The gentleman from Mississippi, in his remarks last evening, said that he thought the free-silver question would be relegated to the rear, and he undertook to tell us why. Perhaps his language was stronger than that; I do not wish to risk misquoting him by making it any stronger than that, but it implied that he is going to tell my distinguished constituent out at Lincoln to "go way back and sit down;" that he was going to place him in cold storage, so to speak, in this next campaign; that he had decided that Mr. Bryan was no longer an inspired promulgator of paramount issues. Let me say to the gentleman that he has not known my distinguished constituent as long, nor I believe as well, as I have; he has not run up against him as many times as I have. If he had known him as I have, he would know that no ukase issued by any one man in the Democratic party will ever impress Mr. Bryan with the idea that he has passed his day of usefulness or that he should abandon his rank in party circles or give up his ideas at any time on any proposition. [Laughter.]

The gentleman from Mississippi said that conditions have changed; that gold has been pouring into this country; that the accidental discovery of new supplies of gold—and, perhaps, to be exact, he mentioned some of the different mines which have been discovered. I think he spoke of those mines that have been uncovered in Alaska, from which we have brought large quantities of gold into the United States, and the new mines that have been developed in Colorado. And he reasoned that because new mines had been discovered that, therefore, we have more gold in this country, and, therefore, the silver question has been relegated to the rear.

I always admit a fact when it is brought to my attention. I admit that there have been great gold discoveries out in Cripple Creek; that large quantities of gold have been and are being mined in Alaska; that gold has also come to us from other quarters that were not expected. I admit all that.

But let me tell the gentleman something that he will find out if he studies the statistics of this country. For every dollar in gold that we have gotten in the way of increase to our circulating medium out of the gold mines of Cripple Creek and Alaska and all the world, for every dollar in gold that has been added to our money product on that account we have gotten $10 more in gold from foreign nations in the world simply by selling them more than we bought and getting the difference in cash. [Applause on the Republican side.] It is the old story, let me say to the gentleman from Mississippi. It is by following the two little rules that his father gave him when he was a boy—to spend less than his income, and to sell more than he bought. Ah, go back and trace the history of your country in connection with our consular service.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi rose.

Mr. BURKETT. I would rather not yield until I finish my train of thought, and then I will be glad to yield to the gentleman. Let me tell the gentlemen on that side to go back and study the history of their party in connection with our consular service. I have heard some of the older Members of the House tell about that, and I have gone into it somewhat, and I find that every time a proposition has been made in this House to increase the efficiency of our consular service, to broaden and extend that magnificent system, there has always been a Democrat somewhere ready to hop up and obstruct that increase and that upbuilding.

The Republican party has not only advocated the protection of the home markets, but it has also said, "We want to go out and capture the markets of the world." And since 1897 we have sold to foreign nations more than $3,000,000,000 worth more of goods than we have bought of these countries, and we have gotten that $3,000,000,000 in cash. I read last week of a great ship——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi again rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Nebraska yield to the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. It is right on the point that the gentleman is talking about.

Mr. BURKETT. Not till I get through.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman is getting away from the point I want to ask him about.

Mr. BURKETT. I will go back to it whenever the gentleman suggests his question.

I read only two or three days ago of a great ship that started out of New York with 10,000 tons of American-manufactured goods on board. I remember also when it was announced six months or a year ago that a ship started out with 8,000 tons of American-made farm machinery—reapers, harvesters, binders and threshers, wagons, corn planters—all made in this country with American money, with American muscle, out of American material; and that ship went clear around the world over to Russia with that cargo.

I read the speech of a distinguished gentleman the other day who had traveled in Europe, and he said he saw on almost every road in Europe engines that were made in the United States. What a wonderful fact that is! What a sermon that is to the gospel of Republicanism! How that must thrill the heart of every American citizen, to feel that we are sending our products into every market on the face of the earth! How have we done it? Because we have not been satisfied simply to protect our own markets for the things that we produce in this country, but the Republican party has gone on with an even greater determination into the larger field of conquering foreign markets. It has gone out to capture the markets of the world and make them respond for the welfare and happiness of the American people, the progress and development of the American nation. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now I will yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the gentleman three questions in one.

Mr. BURKETT. I hope so, because I am ready to stop. I am becoming somewhat fatigued.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I am sorry the gentleman did not let me ask the questions while he was talking on those particular points.

Mr. BURKETT. We will get right back to the points.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now, I will have to repeat the statement somewhat.

Mr. BURKETT. Ask the question.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman said that for every dollar that came from the mines of the world to increase the American supply of gold $10 had come from other nations of the world.

Mr. BURKETT. I estimated it at that; yes. I have not figured it accurately. I made the statement approximately, as the result of some figures I got this morning.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I did not suppose the gentleman intended to do anything more than to approximate it. I do not hold him to an absolutely accurate statement.

Mr. BURKETT. It is somewhere about that.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now, I wish to ask these three questions——

Mr. BURKETT. All right.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Did not this gold that came from the gold mines in other parts of the world come to us chiefly in return for the export of our cotton, wheat, corn, and meat, none of which either are or can be protected? That is one question.

Then I want to ask the gentleman this: Has not the gold supply increased not only here but in Great Britain and Germany and all over Christendom, and has there not been in consequence of that a rise in the scale of world's prices during the time that he is speaking of? That is the second question.

Then I want to ask him, in the third place, if these engines, about which he talks as being sent to all parts of the world and sold in competition there with pauper labor, are not now highly protected under the Dingley bill against competition on the part of foreigners in the American market? I would like the gentleman to answer those questions.

Mr. BURKETT. I will say to the gentleman in response to all three of them that so far as whether or not each of these articles is protected in all forms I do not know that I can tell. I do not suppose the gentleman can. I know in a general way, as he does, but do not carry all the schedules in my mind. Practically, however, I do not see what difference it makes, so far as the amount of what we export is concerned, whether it was protected or not. And I might say in response also that the Democratic party has always insisted that the protective tariff was bound to destroy all our foreign trade. Now, the way that come about at this particular point was, I was showing where the money, the great increase of money, was from. It was $24 per capita when you made your speeches in 1896 and said we needed more money. It is now $30.48 per capita, as is shown from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury made yesterday.

Now, you attribute that all to the discovery of mines. We attribute it, as Republicans, also to the fact that we have increased our exports, and that as we have been able to sell more goods to foreign countries than we were ever able to sell before, that in return we have received more money than ever before.

Now, let me go on and state one more proposition, and then I will be through. I want to see if we can find the real difference between the Republican party and the Democratic party, and why your policy does not bring as good times as Republican policies do. I mean now the general trend of your policies. I do not refer to details of carrying those policies out. The difference as I have always conceived it is this, and I do not know that anybody else will agree with me, but the difference is in the way we work and the objects that we seek to gain and the class of people we seek to benefit. The Republican party always works for the benefit of the producer; the Democratic party works for the benefit of the consumer.

Now, that is the difference between the two parties, in my judgment, in a few words. The Republican party works for the benefit of the producer and the Democratic party helps the consumer. A man must be a producer to be benefited by Republican policy. It does not make any difference whether he produces steam engines or ax handles or a bushel of corn or an hour's work or what it is. If he is a producer, he is helped when the Republican party is in power. The Democratic party, on the other hand, gives little concern to the producer, but seeks to make things cheap for the consumer.

Mr. Chairman, I remember very well the first time that I ever heard my distinguished constituent, Mr. Bryan, speak in the campaign for election to Congress in 1892. I remember that he carried an old hat, a butcher knife, a bolt of red flannel, and a tin pan around with him, and he said that that terrible high protective tariff was robbing the people.

He would hold up that bolt of red flannel and in a manner that brought tears to the eyes of the people would tell them that by the action of the Republican party that every yard of that flannel that went into the poor man's shirt cost him half a cent a yard more than it ought to cost him as a result of that terrible McKinley protective tariff. After getting the people to agonizing over their terrible condition he then proposed that if they would elect him and Grover Cleveland that they would knock off that half a cent a yard and restore it to the poor laboring man. The people accepted his proposition. They let him and Grover Cleveland in, and within six months they had stolen the whole shirt. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

There was not a laboring man in this country in the four years that followed that ever thought of having a flannel shirt. They did not wear flannel shirts in those good old Democratic days. Now, I will admit that you believe in making things cheap, and I admit you do make things cheap, but you do not make them easier to get. I remember that when Cleveland was President, in 1894, 1895, and 1896, horses were cheaper in this country than they were ever before or since. That is a question we know of, because we produce horses in Nebraska, and they got so cheap that we used to can them and send them back East here to you people to eat. [Laughter.] Horses were cheaper than ever before, but more people went on foot than had ever walked since the flood. House rent was cheaper than ever before, and there were more people without homes than ever before. I admit that bread was cheaper than ever before. It got down to 2 or 3 cents a loaf, and yet in every town in this country the people had to take up collections to buy bread for the laboring men of this country who could not provide for their wives and families at home.

I remember that all these things were cheaper, but let me say you did not make any of them easier to get. The Republican party helps the producer, and whenever I find a man who is not a producer I can not believe he is helped much in Republican times. I am frank to admit it. Whenever you see one of those men complaining about the times, you can set him down as a nonproducer, and usually as a Democrat, too. Whenever you see a man sitting on a goods box whittling and spitting and criticising the Government, complaining of the times, set him down as a nonproducer, and usually a Democrat.

Now, a man came into my office whom I knew very well a year or so ago, and he began to find fault with the times. He said that he could not see that they were any better than they were before, and that it was just as hard to live as it ever had been. Now, I knew his business; he was a collector. He collected the money that his wife made taking in washing. So, when he insisted that he could not see any of our good times, I said to him, "Have you sold any corn?" He said, "No; I haven't had any corn to sell." I said, "Have you sold any horses?" He replied, "No; I haven't had any to sell." I then said, "Have you done any work?" "No," he replied; "I am not able to work."

Now, he had not produced a thing, not a bushel of corn nor an hour's work or a thing in the world, and yet he was kicking at the Republican party because it did not fan prosperity into his face. It never will, because he is not a producer. I remember one day last summer a hailstorm came through our county, and the next day a friend of mine came in and said, "We had a hailstorm out our way last night that wiped me off the face of the earth. I have not left standing a hill of corn or a spear of wheat. Everything that I had has gone." Five minutes of hailstorm changed that man from a producer into a consumer. I admit that 30-cent corn did not help him, because he had to buy it. I admit that high prices did not help my friend, because he was a consumer. But it did help every other man in that county and State who did produce something. There is more production than consumption in this country. Every man expects to produce more of something than he consumes. Therefore the Republican party helps the larger end of this industrial proposition.

In concluding let me urge you Democrats to consider the paramount issue of the Republican party. There may be this or that particular thing put to the front, as the exigencies of the times may necessitate. I mean that this thing or that thing may be acute in the coming campaign. But the Republican party on the tariff question, on the money question, on every other question, on schedules and ratios, will continue in the future, just as it has in the past, to press forward to attain the one goal—"the welfare and the happiness of the American people, the progress and the development of the American nation." [Applause.]

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN].

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, I can do but scant justice to the extended remarks of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT] in the brief time at my disposal. It is true that in 1896 the Democratic party favored the immediate restoration of bimetallism. Its newspapers and orators were bitter in their denunciation of the gold standard. Some of them may have used the identical language of the late President McKinley, who looked with concern upon the financial policy inaugurated by Grover Cleveland and denounced it and the gold standard in extravagant terms.

Mr. Cleveland's policy was opposed by a majority of the Democrats in this Chamber and at the other end of the Capitol. It was supported by the Republican press and the Republican membership of the American Congress. It was denounced by many Republicans and by nearly all Democrats as a menace to the welfare of the country.

It was distinctly the policy of the great bankers of two continents and was inaugurated by Grover Cleveland. In so far as a mere instrument may lay claim to a work performed under direction of a master, it may be called Mr. Cleveland's policy. It was a policy which no other man holding high position had previously espoused, one that emanated from no political party.

Although the dearest object to a coterie of gentlemen, millionaire speculators and stockjobbers, who since 1893 have been the advisers of Presidents, it found no outspoken champion holding a position of authority until 1893. Its enforcement, effected as it was by the institution of a reign of terror, caused by a shopmade panic, brought upon this great continent the desolation of a desert and the gloom of the grave. It may be observed in passing that since then its real author has been caught, red-handed, in a financial scheme of plunder, by which a multitude of small investors have been robbed by means as criminal as those resorted to by Canada Bill, the notorious king of confidence men, in fleecing his numerous victims.

The financial policy of Grover Cleveland, which has become the corner stone of the Republican creed, was promoted by J. Pierpont Morgan, who was recently unmasked as a coarse swindler, and so sinks from the position of adviser of Presidents and inventor of financial legislation to the level of the man with a gold brick to sell or the fakir with three cunning little shells at a county fair. [Laughter.]

But, Mr. Chairman, it is pertinent to inquire what answer was made by the Republicans to the arguments made by the Democrats in 1896. Did they say that the gold standard was to be established? No. Did they say that in seven or eight years the addition of five or six hundred million dollars in gold to the volume of money would cause a rise in prices and better times? Nay, verily. They said we didn't need any more money; that we only needed confidence. They said they didn't want higher prices for the products of labor.

The Republican literature of that period urged the workingmen to vote against Bryan as a means of preventing a rise in prices. Republican orators told the workingman that by enforcing the gold standard the purchasing power of a dollar had been enhanced, and that this was a benefit to the wage-earners. They said that what was wanted was a dollar of enhanced purchasing power. For, said they, this would enable the workingman to obtain more for the fruits of his labor.

Again, I inquire of gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber, did you predict that the gold supply of this country would be recruited to the extent of five or six hundred million of dollars during the ensuing eight years? No. You said there was money enough. You insisted that confidence in the ability to secure credit and not more money was needed. You ridiculed the contention of the Democrats that the country needed a larger supply of specie. In the teeth of all writers on political economy, you ridiculed the quantitative theory of money and insisted that there was little or no relation between the volume of money and prices.

I challenge the gentleman from Nebraska to produce here a single Republican speech made at that time in either House of Congress which looked forward to the future and predicted or suggested an early solution of the financial question, as far as coinage was concerned, by a tremendous increase in the output of the gold mines.

Mr. Chairman, some of the gentleman's figures almost took my breath away. It is common for gentlemen to use figures trippingly—thousands, millions, billions. Why, he said that in a few years past we had exported three billions' worth of produce in excess of our imports, and that thereby for every dollar obtained from American gold mines we have drawn $10 from abroad.

Does the gentleman know that the production of American gold mines during the past eight years aggregates a sum almost equal to that which has been added to our gold supply during the same period?

Mr. Chairman, I am as firmly convinced as I was in 1896 that the world needs bimetallism. It is not true—it never will be true—that the world's commerce can be based upon a single metallic standard with safety to civilization.

Consult statistics and you will discover that the coinage question has not been finally settled, and you will also be convinced that, while it may not excite popular interest now, sooner or later it will become again a prominent theme of political discussion in all parts of the world. While we have been recruiting our specie we have imported over one hundred millions in excess of our exports of gold from European countries. It is advisable to take some account of how far they have recruited their supply and what has been the effect of our imports of gold upon business conditions abroad.

Just before Secretary Gage retired from the Treasury Department I requested him to have prepared for me a table showing the balances in the public and private depositories of each of the great continental powers of Europe, including Russia, on the first of the fiscal year of the preceding eight years. In that period, remarkable as it may seem, the aggregate addition to the visible supply of gold in all these countries, with a population of 400,000,000, during this period was less than $100,000,000. Instead of gaining, some had suffered a diminution in their stock of gold.

Russia to-day has over $100,000,000 less gold than she had at the beginning of the era of increased gold production. Germany, for the seven or eight years, has stood still, neither gaining or losing. France increased her supply very little. England added seventy millions to her gold supply by loans during the war with the Boers. And in all these countries hard times and business depressions prevailed throughout the period in which their supply of specie was diminishing, or at least not increasing appreciably.

Gentlemen, do not imagine that the people are ready to swallow such oratory as we have been listening to. They know that added to the product of our mines for seven or eight years there has been a steady flow of gold to this country, adding to our money supply five or six hundred millions of dollars of specie. Do not imagine that because we are on the tidal wave resulting from this unexpected providential addition to our money supply you can induce the country to believe that your campaign of 1896 led up to or caused it.

The Democrats did not expect this large increase in the gold supply. No more did the Republicans. The country was in despair. The Democrats demanded the coinage of silver, claiming that more money of redemption was indispensable. The Republicans demanded more confidence; declared that credit, not money, was needed. The Democratic remedy has been applied. The Republican remedy could not have restored prosperity.

The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT] says that Nebraska had adjusted itself to the new creed adopted by the Republican party for the first time in 1896, months and months before the St. Louis convention. Well, if it had, an adjustment must have been necessary. At best, this is an admission that until a little while before the campaign of 1896 the Republicans in Nebraska, as elsewhere, were out-and-out bimetallists, and if they changed front a little earlier than the rest it matters not. Before changing front they must have been in agreement with the Democratic heretics of '96 and in favor of just what we contended for at that time.

Why, the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] and the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] as late as the short session of 1896–97 stood upon this floor and said then that their party was still struggling for bimetallism—that they wanted bimetalism—and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] was accused by the gentleman from New York, Mr. Quigg, of "reading a man out of the party" because he did not believe in bimetallism.

This would go to show that even after the election in 1897 you still adhered to what you knew was a hypocritical makeshift—that part of your party platform which pledged you to labor for an international agreement for the coinage of silver. Until now you have not dared to say to the people that you are for the single gold standard.

Now, what is the truth as to monetary conditions throughout the world to-day? Why, history is simply repeating itself. Gold is, for the time being, more abundant than silver. The gold mines have become exceedingly productive. Hence, money has become more accessible. The supply is becoming larger. As long as this continues, prosperity will continue. When it ceases, dry rot will ensue in the business world. Monometallism will be responsible for the disaster to mankind. When this continent was discovered the world had little silver in circulation.

It had all gone to the Orient in the course of trade, and gold was the money of commerce in western nations. Why? Because it was most abundant. The discovery of great deposits and accumulations of silver in Mexico and South America resulted in the substitution of the more abundant metal. The treasure ships of the Spaniard carried to every part of the world vast sums of silver, and the channels of commerce were filled with it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, can I have two minutes more? There does not seem to be anybody here who has charge of the time.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, I will yield the gentleman two minutes of my time.

Mr. COCHRAN. The result was that for a lengthened period silver was almost the only money of commerce throughout the world. Almost the whole world was using the Spanish milled dollar. Then came the discoveries of gold in 1848, 1849, and 1850 in California and Australia, and again the world did business with gold. The discovery of the Bonanza mines in 1868 and 1869 in Nevada promised another era in which silver would reappear. Then for the first time in modern history monometallism was made effective by hostile legislation. Inevitably the world suffered disaster by this new departure. It is unnecessary and would not be desirable, even if I had time, to rehearse the evidences that this new policy visited dry rot upon the business world everywhere. Business depression, falling prices, insolvency, and ruin were at our doors. We demanded more money and the free coinage of silver as a means of supplying it. You said we needed only confidence.

You would hold us to our contention literally. Then stand by your own. How would you like to trade off the great supply of money unexpectedly furnished by the gold mines for the "confidence" which you said in 1896 was all that was needed? Have we any money to spare? Why, notwithstanding the addition of five or six hundred millions of specie in the years that have followed your assertion that no more was needed, let fifty millions take wings tomorrow, leaving your gold supply four or five hundred millions greater than it was in 1896, and financial chaos would shake the continent.

You know that we could not export $50,000,000 of the gold supply in the coming six months without serious embarrassment to business. What, then, becomes of your doctrine of "confidence?"

Is it true that the Republican theory was put in practice after the election of Mr. McKinley as President in 1896 there ensued an era of renewed confidence, and that renewed confidence has caused higher prices, and with higher prices, consequently, good times? No. More money has saved the country from greater losses. Your remedy was never applied. It was an impossible remedy.

You know and I know that the change in the conditions in the financial world is not the result of Republican policies. It has been brought about, as my friend from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] said yesterday, by two things—by an enormous production of gold in the world, and, in so far as we have been especially benefited by it, by a large balance of trade in our favor, which has enabled us to appropriate the lion's share of the gold. The farmers of the West and South have helped most, for, after all, the exports of this country have been and ever will be more largely composed of agricultural products than anything else. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] is now entitled to the floor for fifty-eight minutes.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, under date of January 2, 1904, the secretary of the Union League Club of New York City addressed a letter to the various members of the Fifty-eighth Congress. Accompanying this letter was a copy of the report of the committee of the club on political reform, dated April 9, 1903, and a copy of certain resolutions adopted by the club on December 10, 1903.

The resolutions referred to read as follows:

Resolved, That the Government be requested to instruct the district attorneys in the various States where an illegal suppression of votes is alleged to prosecute every case where there has been a violation of the laws of the United States in reference to suffrage, if adequate evidence can be obtained to justify a submission of such case to the grand jury.

Resolved, (1) That Congress be requested and be respectfully urged to investigate with thoroughness and impartiality the charges of a suppression of votes contrary to the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution of the United States; and in every case where such restriction is accomplished by a limitation of the franchise for any reason the representation of such State in Congress be reduced; and also to see that the fifteenth amendment be in no way violated either directly or by subterfuge; and (2) that where the decisions of the courts or the practices at elections disclose the fact that the statutes are inadequate, amendatory acts be passed remedying the defects disclosed.

This resolution, referring as it does to what is undoubtedly the greatest problem in the domestic life of the Republic, forcibly emphasizes the fact that there is in the present Congress, as evidenced by bills and resolutions already introduced by individual Members of the House, a radical, and apparently an irreconcilable, difference of opinion.

On November 10, 1903, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] offered a resolution providing for the appointment of a committee by this House to investigate the election laws of the several States of the Union, with a view to ascertaining whether or not any State was violating the provisions of the Constitution in reference to suffrage, and if so, to what extent, and with the ulterior purpose of finally imposing upon such States as may restrict the suffrage the penalty of reduced representation in this House and in the electoral college.

On November 13, 1903, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DICK] offered a resolution providing that the standing Committee on Election of the President, Vice-President, and Representatives in Congress should be empowered to investigate the question of the denial of the elective franchise, in violation of the Constitution, the ulterior purpose of this resolution being identical with that of the preceding measure.

On November 11, 1903, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN] offered a joint resolution proposing the repeal of the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution, and on November 16, 1903, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] offered a similar resolution.

On the last-named day, to wit, November 16, 1903, I had the honor of proposing two joint resolutions on this general subject—one providing for the repeal of the fifteenth amendment and the other providing that all of section 2 of the fourteenth amendment, save the first sentence thereof, should be repealed.

While none of these resolutions have yet been reported, and none of them may ever emerge, during the present session at least, from the caterpillar stage of committeeism into the butterfly life of House existence, yet the fact that they have already been introduced is significant of the difference of opinion to which I have already alluded.

It will be readily observed that these resolutions, all involving the same great question, are capable of one general subdivision; those of the gentlemen from Ohio and Indiana treating of the Constitution as it is now written and proposing an investigation of its alleged violation, and the last four resolutions—those introduced by the gentlemen from North Carolina, Alabama, and myself—dealing with the broader and greater question as to whether the Constitution is right or wrong and ought or ought not to be changed.

The first class of these resolutions involves, primarily, the determination of a great question of fact; the second involves solely the consideration of an even greater question of public policy and statesmanship. Although the two questions are closely allied and the same great fundamental principles of government underlie them both, yet I can not, in the course of the limited time at my command to-day, undertake to discuss them both; and being confined to the discussion of one branch of the matter only, I shall discuss the broader and deeper question of right and wrong, rather than the narrower and more restricted question as to whether or not, in point of fact, there exists in any State of the Union such a condition of affairs as requires or justifies the introduction and passage of the resolutions proposed by the distinguished gentlemen from Indiana and Ohio.

If on some future occasion the necessity should arise, I propose to submit a few remarks upon those resolutions, but for the present I shall pass the specific question involved in them with the remark in passing, that if the same tests are applied to all the States, it will be discovered that the limitation of the elective franchise in various ways has not been confined to the South alone, that by Australian ballot laws, of varying provisions, the right to vote has been abridged in every State of the Union, except North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia; that in ten States of the Union there are educational or property qualifications for voting, or both, and that only six of those States are in the South; that in Oregon, California, Idaho, and Nevada Chinese are expressly excluded from voting by State constitutions, although they may be citizens of the United States; that by the organic law of Idaho male citizens of the United States 21 years of age, who have never violated any law are debarred from voting if they believe in or countenance the Mormon religion—whether they are polygamists or not.

I call the especial attention of the distinguished gentleman from Ohio to the fact that there is to-day in the organic law of his State, as well as in that of Oregon, an express provision that only white men shall vote, and that while it is true that these provisions were both adopted before the ratification of the fifteenth amendment, and are of course unconstitutional because in express conflict with that amendment, yet they were written in the organic law by the votes of the people of those States, and are upon the statute books of those States to-day—unrepealed by them—where they stand, ghostly but eloquent witnesses of the Caucasianism of their people.

I respectfully invite the attention of the distinguished gentleman and of the Union League Club to the constitution and laws of the State of Vermont, by which citizens who are of quiet and peaceable behavior, and who have the approbation of the board of civil authority, shall alone be permitted to vote: the most far-reaching provision that was ever adopted in any State, North or South.

And in concluding these passing remarks I would respectfully suggest to the esteemed Union League Club that it re-refer this great question to its committee on political reform, with instructions to investigate laws and conditions in every one of the States, and particularly in the States of Maine, Connecticut, Massachusetts, Ohio, Oregon, California, Idaho, Wyoming, Nevada, and Vermont, in addition to the Southern States that it has honored with its especial and particular attention.

Subterfuge, indirection, and evasion, always disgusting, would, in this presence and on this occasion, be doubly so; on the contrary, candor is the highest compliment courage can pay to intelligence, and adopting that as my rule of conduct on this occasion, I will speak to you candidly and plainly on this question of negro suffrage, for that, as we all know, is the sole question that lies at the bottom of all these resolutions and of all this clamor for the enforcement of constitutional provisions. While I intend to be candid in the discussion of the matter, yet I do not wish to state my arguments and conclusions offensively or bitterly or to voice the sentiment of my people in a sectional or partisan manner; my object is not to excite sectional prejudice or party bitterness, but to allay them; not to offend, but to conciliate; not to denounce gentlemen who may not agree with me, but to reason with them: but, gentlemen, because I use the language of conciliation, of friendship, and of brotherhood, let no man misunderstand my motives or mistake my spirit.

I thank God that we are at peace again and have once more a reunited and prosperous country; that the South is back once more in the house of her fathers and is there to stay forever, but I also thank Him, sir, that she is not here debased and humiliated and ashamed, with sackcloth on her back or with ashes on her head. She is here, yielding to no section in love for this splendid nation, whose glory is the marvel of the earth, or in loyalty to that flag of the Republic whose every star has been brightened by the valor of her sons and whose every stripe has been bathed in her noblest blood. She is here in a generous, manly spirit, with her great heart throbbing with love and patriotism for our common country and with her every hill and valley sending back an echo of that magnanimous spirit that not six years ago prompted our last martyred President, the great McKinley, standing in the State capitol of my own State and addressing its general assembly, to lay his tribute of love and respect upon the bier of her immortal dead.

This, then, is the spirit in which she invokes your consideration of her greatest problem, without bitterness or hate, and yet, without truckling or debasement, an equal among equals, claiming the right to present in candor and in fairness her views upon that mighty problem in which is bound up her very existence, and demanding that they shall be received with a patriotism that scorns sectionalism and with a statesmanship that will not stoop to make possible political capital out of the travail of brethren.

On January 1, 1861, there were only four out of the thirty-one States that then constituted the Union in which negroes were permitted to vote—namely, the States of Vermont, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, and New York. In the first three of these States the right existed by virtue of the broad language used in their earlier constitutions, and in the last-named State it existed by express enactment; but there were at this time in Vermont only 194 possible negro voters to 87,462 possible white voters; in New Hampshire, only 149 negroes of voting age to 91,954 whites of voting age, and in Massachusetts only 2,502 male negroes of voting age to 339,085 whites; and it must be remembered that even at this time all voters in Massachusetts were subject to an educational qualification.

In New York negroes were expressly admitted to the suffrage, but there were at this time in that State only 12,989 negroes of voting age to 1,027,895 whites, and yet, with even this insignificant proportion, the laws of New York required of the negro voter a property qualification of $250 that it did not exact of the white voter—a restriction which probably excluded fully 90 per cent of the possible negro voters in New York, as is pointed out by Mr. Curtis in his admirable Constitutional History of the United States. It will thus be observed that even in these four States the gift was, in three cases out of four, accidental; that in every case it was a theoretical rather than a practical gift, and that in the case in which it was expressly conferred it was hedged about by partial conditions.

Up to January 1, 1861, while the country had for some years literally blazed with antislavery agitation, yet there was no respectable or considerable sentiment anywhere or in any party in favor of negro enfranchisement—certainly no political party in its national platform had ever espoused it. Mr. Lincoln himself, at that time the President-elect—the most illustrious statesman his party has ever produced and certainly the one man above all others entitled to speak for it where its platform was silent—had denounced the doctrine as a heresy and had proclaimed his emphatic and irrevocable opposition to it on more than one occasion.

During the year 1861 the people of Missouri amended their constitution and during this same year the people of West Virginia formed a constitution upon which they were finally admitted to the Union, but in neither State was the suffrage extended to the negro.

In 1862 Michigan amended her constitution, but again was the "colored man and brother" ignored. In 1863 there were no constitutional changes by the States, but in 1864 new constitutions were adopted or old ones amended in Arkansas, Connecticut, Kansas, Louisiana, Maryland, Nevada, New York, Rhode Island, Pennsylvania, and Virginia, and yet in not one of all this great array of States was negro suffrage even hinted at.

In 1865 constitutional amendments providing for negro suffrage were submitted by the legislatures of Connecticut, Colorado, Wisconsin, and Minnesota, but when these provisions were submitted to the people in the fall elections of 1865, negro suffrage was rejected in each and every one of these States by decisive majorities.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Why, they vote now and have been voting for years in my State.

Mr. HARDWICK. What State does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Connecticut.

Mr. HARDWICK. You have an educational qualification?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. And always have had.

Mr. HARDWICK. So that at the close of 1865, while the emancipation of the negro was an accomplished fact, his enfranchisement was apparently as distant as on the day the war began.

In tracing the history of the negro suffrage movement, I come next to that period in the history of our country known as "reconstruction," memories of which, I hope, are unpleasant to the people of every State and section. Certainly the word recalls to the entire South, and especially, possibly, to my own State of Georgia, the bitterest and saddest period of her history, when her cup of humiliation was indeed full and her people drank of the very dregs of despair. During its progress her people suffered agonies a thousand fold more bitter to a spirited, high-strung people than even the untold miseries of war; but with a courage that might have been expected of the most homogeneous of all the American people they went to work to restore their shattered fortunes, and upon the ruins of their old civilization they built the South of to-day—that marvelous edifice of material wealth and industrial independence that is now challenging the admiration of the world.

Painful as are the memories of reconstruction to us all, yet I believe the time has at last come when we can discuss some of its events without prejudice or bitterness, and in that spirit I shall undertake it.

On December 8, 1863, President Lincoln issued a proclamation offering general amnesty to the people of the South and outlining his plan of reconstruction, which has been truly termed "most liberal and humane," but as it was made at a time when the South was undefeated in the field and hopeful of the final result of the appeal to arms, it had no practical effect and is chiefly significant now to show what Mr. Lincoln's plan was. While Mr. Lincoln demanded freedom for the slaves of the South and insisted upon their education, he demanded nothing more than these two things, and expressly stated that with these modifications when a State government was reconstructed "its constitution and laws prior to the rebellion" should be respected. Nowhere did he expressly or impliedly demand or suggest that the right to vote should be bestowed upon the negro.

It has, however, been contended that Mr. Lincoln modified this position in the Hahn letter of March 13, 1864, in which he suggested for the "private consideration" of Hon. Michael Hahn, the provisional governor of Louisiana, whether or not the constitutional convention about to assemble in Louisiana might with safety extend the elective franchise to the very intelligent negroes, and especially to those who had fought in the Union Army. The letter does not indicate that Mr. Lincoln had modified his oft-repeated views in opposition to negro suffrage, even to the very moderate extent suggested in the letter, although it is true that he was considering the modification of them to that extent only, and it is significant to note that six weeks after this letter, Wendell Phillips, one of the ablest and most earnest advocates of negro suffrage, indorsed the movement of the radical wing of the Republican party to nominate in 1864 an independent Republican candidate against Mr. Lincoln, the alleged cause of the schism in the dominant party being what was termed Mr. Lincoln's weak and vacillating war policy and his too mild and ineffectual policy of southern reconstruction.

Mr. Phillips not only indorsed this radical movement, but on May 27, 1864, he wrote a letter to Edward Gilbert, esq., of New York, which was read before the Fremont Convention, at Cleveland, Ohio, in May, 1864, in which letter Mr. Phillips used this among other expressions:

> There is no plan of reconstruction possible within twenty years unless we admit the black to citizenship and the ballot and use him with the white as the basis of States. * * * Against such recognition Mr. Lincoln stands pledged by prejudice and avowal.

In the next place, in December, 1864, after his overwhelming reelection, Mr. Lincoln stated in his annual message to the Thirty-eighth Congress that his views on southern reconstruction had undergone no change, and those views as will be remembered, did not include negro suffrage for the South.

It is true that in the last speech of his life, on April 11, 1865, only a few days before his assassination, Mr. Lincoln publicly expressed in somewhat more positive terms the idea he had suggested for the "private consideration" of Governor Hahn the year before. He said:

> It is also unsatisfactory to some that the elective franchise is not given to the colored man. I would myself now prefer that it were conferred on the very intelligent, and those who serve our cause as soldiers.

The phraseology of the great war President is significant. He classes himself apart, in another class, from those who were "dissatisfied." He favored and upheld the Louisiana government, while those who were "dissatisfied" opposed it. He personally favored negro suffrage in these exceptional cases he mentioned, principally no doubt out of gratitude to the negroes who had served as Union soldiers; and yet he did not abandon his fixed and announced reconstruction policy or even suggest that negro suffrage ought to be forced upon any State, even if such State was in the process of reconstruction.

President Lincoln's contention was that it was the right of the Executive to reconstruct the State governments of the South. This doctrine, however, was not agreed to by the Congress, and the result of this difference of opinion was the passage of the first Congressional reconstruction act of July 2, 1864. This act may fairly be assumed to represent the sentiment of that wing of the Republican party that was opposed to Presidential reconstruction, and it is therefore particularly worthy of note that in this act the elective franchise was limited to "white males of 21 years of age."

From this act Mr. Lincoln withheld his approval, and it therefore failed to become a law, for which he was roundly abused in the Davis and Wade manifesto of August 5, 1864.

The political effect of this difference between the Congress and the President was a political schism in the Republican party, the more radical members of that party, who disagreed with the President's war policy and reconstruction plan, nominating John C. Fremont for President at Cleveland, Ohio, on May 31, 1864, on a platform radical enough in all truth, but which, while demanding equal civil rights for the negro, did not demand the elective franchise for him, although that it should do so was expressly suggested by Wendell Phillips and others. On September 21, 1864, Fremont withdrew, and in the election of November, 1864, Mr. Lincoln triumphed over the Democratic nominee, Gen. George B. McClellan, by a popular majority of more than 400,000 votes and by the enormous electoral majority of 191 votes.

Hon. A. C. Braxton, a distinguished lawyer of Staunton, Va., whose able paper, read at the last meeting of the Virginia Bar Association, is one of the most valuable contributions to the legal and political literature of this great subject, has well suggested that the "senseless and dastardly assassination of Mr. Lincoln in April, 1865, greatly exasperated the Northern people against the South, and added to the flames of sectional hatred already burning brightly." I fully agree with him. It was a double misfortune. Mr. Lincoln, although much misunderstood by the people of the South at the time, had already given indisputable evidences of a patriotism too sincere and of a statesmanship too lofty to deal harshly with the stricken people of the South, and if he had lived to complete the work of reconstruction that he began, his kindly heart and magnanimous spirit would have completely won the South, while his unswerving hand and unbending will would have held steady the helm of the ship of state and steered it at a much earlier period into the peaceful waters of sectional reconciliation and of patriotic nationalism.

His successor, President Johnson, attempted to carry out the reconstruction policy of his illustrious predecessor; but, although undoubtedly devoted to great constitutional principles, he was not without his faults and weaknesses, and besides was hardly placed—a Southern man, yet hated at the South because of what was regarded as his apostasy, and hated at the North because he was suspected of an undue leaning to the people of the section of his birth. His weaker hand could not guide the tossing ship, and Executive reconstruction rapidly gave way to Congressional reconstruction.

The first evidence of this change was the passage over the President's veto, on June 8, 1867, of a bill introduced in 1865 establishing negro suffrage in the District of Columbia. Before its passage provision had been made by Congress for the submission of the question to the voters of the District, and the result had been that, in one of the largest votes ever cast in the District of Columbia, negro suffrage had been overwhelmingly rejected by its people, 35 votes being polled for it in Washington City and 6,521 against it; 1 vote for it in Georgetown and 812 against it—an aggregate of 36 votes for it and 7,333 against it—and yet, in spite of this overwhelming expression of the popular will and in defiance of every principle of local self-government, the Thirty-ninth Congress ordained negro suffrage for the District of Columbia, being actuated by two motives; first, because the leaders of the Republican party in that Congress felt impelled to make some concession, however trifling, to the growing sentiment in their own ranks in favor of the general enfranchisement of the negro in the South and in the Territories, and, next, because they wished to make an experiment on a small scale as to the results of the system.

If the times had not been so turbulent, and they had been willing to patiently await the result of the experiment, it is only fair to conclude that they would not have inflicted either subsequent reconstruction acts upon the people of the South or the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments upon the people of the Republic, for so unsatisfactory did the experiment of negro suffrage in the District of Columbia prove that by the act of February 21, 1871, a Territorial form of government was given the District, and by the act of June 20, 1874, as finally amended by the act of 1878, the present system of District government was established, so that while white manhood suffrage had proven satisfactory in the District of Columbia for the sixty-five years intervening between 1802 and 1867, impartial manhood suffrage only survived four years, that much of the experiment entirely reconciling the people of the District to a total deprivation of all voting rights in preference to a continued endurance of existing conditions.

In the meantime the Congress had not been slow in extending the experiment of negro suffrage to the Territories of the United States and to the States of the South, who, exhausted by the most bloody and devastating war that the world had ever witnessed, lay helpless and powerless at its feet.

In May, 1866, Congress, again disregarding the same principles of local self-government, and acting in the very teeth of a contrary expression from the people of Colorado, not eight months old, had peremptorily established negro suffrage in Colorado and in all the Territories of the United States.

In 1866 Nebraska sought admission into the Union, with a constitution that limited the elective franchise to white males 21 years of age, adopted by a popular vote, and yet, in February, 1866, Congress imposed the celebrated "fundamental condition" that Nebraska should be admitted with the understanding that she should not limit the elective franchise because of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, and that this recognition should be made by the legislature of Nebraska in a "solemn act" passed for that purpose. It will be observed that the acceptance of this condition was not left to the people of Nebraska, who could alone make or unmake their constitution, but to its legislature, which had no more power under the rules of constitutional law to change its constitution than the legislature of Georgia would have had to make or amend a constitution for Nebraska.

On March 2, 1867, Congress passed its celebrated, far-reaching, reconstruction act, by which it immediately forced temporary negro suffrage upon the people of the South, and ultimately forced a ratification of the fourteenth amendment.

Under the original Constitution of the United States the representation of the States, both in the House of Representatives and in the electoral college, was based on population, except that representation was only allowed for three-fifths of the slaves. This basis of representation was the result of a compromise between the contending forces of the North and South, effected in the convention that framed the Constitution. It was considered advisable, however, that with emancipation there should be a readjustment of the basis of representation, for the practical politicians of the dominant power viewed with no little alarm the prospect that with population as still the basis of representation, with every freedman counted the States of the South would gain from thirty to forty votes in the electoral college and the House of Representatives, and it was feared that this increased southern power—cooperating with the powerful Democratic party of the North, which had been able to poll 1,800,000 votes in the last Presidential election (1864)—would control the Senate at once and would win the Presidency and the House in the election of 1868.

In the West, which had much to gain from such a change, the remedy suggested was that Federal representation should be based upon the number of qualified voters, rather than on population. This was the remedy suggested by the Republican State convention of Wisconsin in its platform of September, 1865, which was probably the earliest expression of the idea.

On December 5, 1865, Mr. Thaddeus Stevens, of Pennsylvania, voiced this demand by proposing in the House a resolution to amend the Constitution so that "representation shall be apportioned among the States that may be within the Union according to their respective legal voters." When this question came up for debate in January, 1866, Mr. Blaine, of Maine, opposed the proposition embodied in Mr. Stevens's resolution, citing the census reports of 1860 to show that the change from total population to voting population would be manifestly unfair to New England and the Northern States, who had sent so many of their sons to the great West, and thereby largely decreased their relative voting strength.

Among the many illustrations that he gave of the injustice that would be worked by the change was a comparison between Vermont and California, which States were substantially equal in population and had the same number of Representatives; but California had 207,000 voters to Vermont's 87,000, and under Mr. Stevens's plan would have eight Representatives if Vermont should have three. A compromise between these two ideas, effected first in the Committee on Reconstruction and afterwards perfected in conference between the House and Senate, resulted in the fourteenth amendment as it was proposed to the States and as it stands to-day. It reads as follows:

ARTICLE XIV.

SECTION 1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

SEC. 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the legislature thereof is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being 21 years of age and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in proportion which the number of such male citizens bears to the whole number of male citizens 21 years of age in such State.

Sections 3 and 4 of the amendment are not pertinent to this discussion, while section 5 simply provides that Congress shall have the power by appropriate legislation to enforce the provisions of the article.

The Thirty-ninth Congress finally adopted this amendment on June 16, 1866, and sent it out to the several States for their adoption or rejection.

It is worthy of note that many of the more radical Republicans thought and stated, while the amendment was being discussed, particularly in the Senate, that the first section of the amendment protected political as well as civil rights, this view being expressed in the Senate debate by Senators Ross of Kansas and Edmunds of Vermont; but in the case of Minor v. Happersett (21 Wallace, 162) the Supreme Court held that the right to vote was not a "privilege or immunity" within the meaning of this section, and in that case and many others has uniformly held that this section does not add to the privileges and immunities of citizens, but simply prohibits the States from denying or abridging existing privileges or immunities.

The second section of the proposed amendment was considered by the Republican leaders as a most happy solution of the difficult problem presented in readjusting the basis of representation, for by it the New England and Northern States would lose no part of their representation or comparative power, as they must necessarily have done had the voting population been made the basis of representation, while under its provisions the Southern States could only make the dreaded gains in power in the event they enfranchised the negro—a result that thoughtful Republicans did not seriously fear, as they felt that the people of the South would not pay so dear a price for increased Federal power, and if they did not pay that price, her power could be reduced by a scaled reduction, the most far-reaching and effectual that could be contrived. For these reasons this hybrid, mongrel plan, "neither fish nor fowl," based neither on population or voting strength, but on a crafty combination of both, welded together the controlling elements of the dominant power and was received with glad acclaim by the rank and file as "heaven-sent inspiration."

On June 21, 1866, this amendment was proposed by Congress to the States. At this time, in every respect save that of Congressional representation, the States of the South were back in the Union. Presidential reconstruction had been proclaimed and recognized in them—the appointment of Federal judges and attorneys for them had been confirmed by the Senate, and finally, as the crowning act of recognition, this very amendment submitted to them by the Congress itself for ratification or rejection. At this time there were thirty-six States in the Union. Beginning with Connecticut on June 30, 1866, eighteen States of the North and West and one in the South ratified the amendment prior to March 2, 1867. But in the meantime, while the amendment was pending and before it had either been accepted or rejected, one of those nineteen States—namely, the State of New Jersey—withdrew her assent in September, 1868, as did another of them—namely, Ohio—in January, 1868.

During this same period, beginning with Texas on October 13, 1866, and ending on March 2, 1867, the amendment had been rejected by ten Southern States and the two border States of Kentucky and Delaware, a total of twelve States voting in the negative.

Massachusetts, Iowa, California, Nebraska, and Maryland were yet to act upon it, and of those States it was reasonably certain that the first four would accept it and the last reject it, as the event subsequently proved; which would make twenty-three States voting for the amendment and thirteen against it, even if the affirmative vote of New Jersey should be allowed to stand unchanged. If not, it appeared that the result would be twenty-two votes for it and fourteen against it, and as the amendment required the assent of three-fourths of the States, or twenty-seven affirmative votes, it was apparent that in either event it was irretrievably defeated.

The Thirty-ninth Congress was not to be easily outdone. The situation was desperate, and a desperate remedy was needed. The result was the reconstruction act of March 2, 1867, by which the eleven Southern States, recognized by the President as reconstructed and invited by the Congress itself to vote as sovereign States on a solemn proposition to amend the Constitution of the Republic, were reduced to the condition of conquered provinces and placed under a grinding military rule, simply because they would not vote on this amendment as the Congress desired.

With the history of the gestation that followed we are all too familiar. It is a matter of record that the whites of the South were largely disfranchised and that the negroes of those States, supported and upheld by the military power of the Government, sat in solemn—nay, in farcical—judgment on the great amendment which was the beginning of their enfranchisement, and thus by a most marvelous proceeding voted themselves voters, and gave the so-called subsequent "ratification" of the various Southern States to these two war amendments.

Now that we have arrived at a time when reason has assumed her sway and we can consider this question on both sides fairly and without prejudice, I will venture the assertion that there is no man who is both sane and sensible who will be daring enough to controvert the statement once made by Georgia's greatest commoner, the Hon. Alexander H. Stephens, that this amendment, and the fifteenth as well, was literally pinned to the National Constitution by the bayonets of Federal soldiers.

The fourteenth amendment did not in any way enfranchise the negro. It left in the custody of each State the right that it had from the very beginning of the Government, guaranteed to it by the Constitution, of regulating for itself the qualifications of its electors. For the reason that it did not enfranchise the negro it had not been satisfactory to the more radical Republicans of the Thirty-ninth Congress in both the Senate and House, and the debates of that Congress disclose the fact that in the House Mr. Shellabarger of Ohio, Mr. Elliott of Massachusetts, Mr. Pike of Maine, and Mr. Jenks of Rhode Island all thought that the amendment did not go far enough, and that it ought to prohibit the abridgment of the elective franchise by any State on account of race and color.

Senator Sumner, of Massachusetts, also urged this view in the Senate at length and with eloquence, asserting that the recognition by the fourteenth amendment of the right of any State to disfranchise any of its citizens was "another compromise of human rights."

But these protests in the House and Senate were without avail, for the practical leaders of the Republican party did not feel strong enough in 1866 or 1867 to attempt such a change in the Constitution, nor had current political events strengthened their courage.

In October, 1867, the people of Ohio rejected an amendment to their constitution proposing negro suffrage by 50,629 majority. In November, 1867, Kansas rejected a similar proposition by a majority of 8,938 votes, and in the same month Minnesota rejected a similar proposition by a majority of 1,298 votes.

Indeed, it can not be doubted that the people of every State who had ever voted on this question seemed irreconcilably opposed to negro suffrage. So great was the storm of opposition to it in the North and West, and so afraid were the people of those sections that negro suffrage, which might be good enough for the South, might be forced upon them also, that the Republican party was forced to make the following pledge in its platform of 1868:

> 2. The guaranty by Congress of equal suffrage to all loyal men of the South was demanded by every consideration of public safety, of gratitude, and of justice, and must be maintained; while the question of suffrage in all the loyal States properly belongs to the people of those States.

Upon this pledge the Republican party went to the people and carried the country, electing not only a President and Congress, but obtaining control of both branches of the legislatures of a great majority of the States.

In February, 1869, Mr. Sumner said in the United States Senate that Mr. Thaddeus Stevens had protested against the adoption of the platform declaration I have cited above, as a weak, vacillating, and unworthy surrender of principle, and in his Twenty Years in Congress Mr. Blaine characterized it as "evasive and discreditable." How evasive he did not stop to explain. It could only be discreditable in the view that it proposed to force upon the South something that the North and West were not willing to accept for themselves. It is worthy of comment that none of the criticisms to which I have referred were made publicly until after the election.

The Fortieth Congress met for its last session in December, 1868. It had hardly assembled before the leaders of the dominant party in both Senate and House, with their campaign speeches hardly unmemorized, if I may coin a word, and, with the shouts of victory still ringing in their ears, rushed over each other in their wild efforts to be the first to violate the solemn pledge of their party, which had just given them a new lease of national power and the control of twenty-five State legislatures, by proposing to take from "the loyal States to whom it properly belonged" the right to control the suffrage.

Insensible of shame at this barefaced fraud, they boldly denounced the platform upon which they were successful and yet retained the fruits of their perfidy. I challenge the political history of any republican government for an example of perfidy so bold and complete. Afraid to trust the incoming Congress, although more than two-thirds of each House was Republican, fearful that Senators and Representatives, fresh from the people, might have more regard for the solemn pledges upon which they were elected, they rushed this suffrage amendment through with indecent haste, its final passage being announced on February 26, 1869, just six days before the Congress expired by law.

Up to 1868, as we have already seen, the people of no State in all the Union except New York had ever expressly extended to the negro the right to vote, and every State that had ever acted on the question had expressly declined to do so except New York, and even there the gift was not impartial, as already shown.

But in 1868 the radical wing of the Republican party took some encouragement from the action of Iowa and Minnesota. In 1868 there were in Iowa approximately 1,000 male negroes of voting age to 290,000 whites of voting age, and yet on an issue between the two parties on the proposition to extend the suffrage impartially to the negro the Republicans only succeeded in securing the ratification of such an amendment by a majority of 22,000, less than that given the Republican ticket, and Iowa thus became the first State in the Union to voluntarily extend the suffrage on impartial terms to the negro. The only other encouragement was from Minnesota, where negro suffrage had already twice been rejected by the people, once in 1865 and again in 1867; but in 1868 the undaunted leaders of the radical Republicans returned to the charge and succeeded in inducing the 110,000 white voters of that State to extend the suffrage impartially to the 200 negro voters with its borders.

It can not be contended that the action of any of the Southern States, coerced as they all were by the military and legislative powers of the Government, was voluntary. So that the two States of Iowa and Minnesota are the only States in this Union who ever voluntarily extended the elective franchise to the negro on impartial terms prior to the ratification of the fifteenth amendment, and in each of those States, as I have just demonstrated, there were such an insignificant number of negro voters that the question was more of a theoretical than a practical one.

In 1868 Missouri rejected negro suffrage by 18,000 majority, and during the same year another attempt to enfranchise the negro in Michigan was defeated by 32,000 majority, although Michigan was one of the stanchest of Republican States.

That in proposing the fifteenth amendment the leaders of the Republican party were acting contrary to public sentiment everywhere was boldly admitted during the debate upon it in the Senate by Senator Wilson, of Massachusetts, who said:

> The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Davis] knows, and I know, that this whole struggle to secure equal rights and equal privileges to all citizens of the United States has been an unpopular one; that we have been forced to struggle against passion and prejudice, engendered by generations of oppression and wrong; that we have been compelled to struggle against great interests and powerful political organizations. I say to the Senator from Kentucky that the struggle of the last eight years to give freedom to four and a half million men who were in slavery, to make them citizens of the United States, to clothe them with the suffrage, to make them in all respects equal to the white citizens of the United States, has cost the Republican party a quarter of a million votes.

This assertion was approved by Mr. Blaine, who quotes it in his Twenty Years in Congress, and he further remarks that—

> The Democratic criticisms as to the time and the method of presenting the amendment were well aimed and remained practically unanswered for the simple reason that no adequate or logical response could be made to them.

Why, then, this measure? There were undoubtedly many honest and earnest men in the Fortieth Congress who believed so thoroughly in the principle at stake that they were willing to make any political sacrifice upon its altar. Mistaken and misguided, as I firmly believe this class of men to have been, and harmful as I know their work was, I can not withhold from them that admiration that devotion to principle, even to mistaken principle, always merits. But it must be remembered that the real leaders of the Fortieth Congress were nothing if not practical. The States of the South were helpless under military domination; for the present they need be neither feared nor considered. The people of the North were so grateful to the Republican party, and as yet so unreconciled to the South, that the leaders of the radical wing of the dominant party believed that they could for a while longer hold the North, even if one of their prescriptions should be the nauseating and often-rejected dose of negro suffrage. They were wise men. In any event they had a fresh lease of power, and they knew that then was the proper time to inaugurate a permanent constitutional plan to take the place of the temporary statutory plan of reconstruction, and to deliver over the States of the South to the freedmen and their allies "in fee simple forever," and thus insure perpetuation of their political power.

On February 5, 1869, Mr. Sumner, debating the fifteenth amendment, exclaimed in the Senate:

I do not part from the proprieties of this occasion when I show how completely the course I propose harmonizes with the requirements of the political party to which I belong. Believing most sincerely that the Republican party in its object is identical with the country and mankind, so that in sustaining it I sustain these comprehensive charities, I can not willingly see this agency lose the opportunity of confirming its supremacy. You need votes in Connecticut, do you not? There are 3,000 fellow-citizens in that State, ready at the call of Congress to take their place at the ballot box. You need them also in Pennsylvania, do you not? There are at least 15,000 of them in that great State waiting for your summons. Wherever you most need them, there they are; and be assured that they will all vote for those that stand by them in the assertion of equal rights.

The amendment as finally proposed to the States reads as follows:

ARTICLE XV.

SEC. 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

SEC. 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

On February 26, 1869, the final vote was taken in both Houses. The total number of Representatives to which the States actually admitted to representation in Congress were entitled was 226. There were 3 vacancies, thus reducing the total membership to 223, two-thirds of which would be 149. The record shows that in the House the vote on the passage of the resolution proposing the amendment was—yeas 145, nays 44, not voting 35.

In the Senate there were at the time the vote was taken 66 votes, excluding the 8 Senators from the States of Virginia, Mississippi, Texas, and Georgia, who had not been admitted to the Senate, of which two-thirds was 44; yet the vote in the Senate on the passage of the resolution proposing the fifteenth amendment was—yeas 39, nays 13, not voting 14. So that, while the resolution received in both Houses two-thirds of the votes actually cast, it did not receive two-thirds of the votes of the total membership of either House.

Article V of the Constitution provides:

The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution.

A comparison of the language used in Article V with similar constitutional provisions is not unimportant in order to arrive at the real meaning of Article V.

Article II, section 2, clause 2, provides that the President—shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur.

Article I, section 3, clause 6, provides that no person tried by the Senate as a court of impeachment shall be convicted without "the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present."

It is undoubtedly a grave question as to whether or not, giving due weight to these comparisons, the broader language used in Article V does not require the assent of two-thirds of the total membership of each House in proposing a constitutional amendment. Our Supreme Court has never as yet passed upon that question. Indeed, it has never been presented to it for its adjudication, and I know of no court that has even attempted to pass upon it, except, possibly, the supreme court of Oregon, which in the case of Wood v. Fitzgerald, 3 Oregon, 579, sustained the fifteenth amendment and declared that the clause in the Oregon constitution providing that no negro, mulatto, or Chinaman be allowed to vote was unconstitutional because in conflict with it; but in its opinion the court refuses to go into the objections suggested by counsel as to the validity of the fifteenth amendment, complaining that this was more properly the function of the courts of the United States, and that in the partisan bitterness and excitement then prevailing it would be dangerous for the court to hold the fifteenth amendment unconstitutional.

I apprehend, however, that these reasons will not appear weighty, and that the opinion of this court will not be regarded as very respectable authority by any court, State or Federal, that is true to that greatest principle of judicial ethics among English-speaking people, that it is the solemn duty of the courts to decide the law without regard to the popularity or unpopularity of their decisions.

The amendment was submitted to the people in spite of the protests made in the Senate that the resolution proposing it had not received the requisite constitutional majority, and was rushed to waiting legislatures. In the North and West Republican legislators, impressed with that same dream of perpetual power that had so charmed their party colleagues in Congress, hastened to disregard their instructions from the people and to force negro suffrage upon them by ratifying the amendment, and in their unseemly haste to enter upon the promised heritage of political power they had the effrontery in several States to pass their resolutions of ratification upon the receipt of the telegraphic advices from political friends and associates in Washington, without awaiting official notification from the Department of State that such a resolution was proposed to them or what its terms were. "Carpet baggers," placed in power by Congressional reconstruction, hastened to ratify for the Southern States; and in Virginia, Texas and Mississippi, which were still unreconstructed, ratification was forced by Congress, such ratification being once again made a "fundamental condition" of readmission, at the suggestion of General Butler, of Massachusetts.

On March 30, 1870, the ratification of the amendment was proclaimed by the Secretary of State, and thus the great drama of reconstruction was complete, and there was written in our organic law the last of the great war amendments.

The first of these amendments, the thirteenth, by which slavery was abolished, was accepted by the people of all sections, and by none more loyally and sincerely than the people of the South, as the necessary and logical result of the war, but the last two, the fourteenth and fifteenth, were adopted, if adopted at all, against the will of a majority of all the people in the Union, by trickery and treachery in the North and by force and violence in the South.

Whatever may have been the purpose of the second section of the fourteenth amendment and the fifteenth amendment, yet, construing these two sections in pari materia and giving full force to the provisions of each, the only fair construction of them is that no State may deny or abridge the right to vote of any citizen of the United States simply because of race, color, or previous condition of servitude; but, with this single exception, a State may establish any qualification for voting that its people may ordain—whether that qualification be based on education, on the possession of property, or the prepayment of taxes, or upon any other basis whatsoever, except race, color, or previous condition of servitude—provided that if, in so doing, it shall in any way deny or abridge the right to vote of any of its male inhabitants 21 years of age and citizens of the United States, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, then such State is subject to the proportionate reduction imposed by the fourteenth amendment, if the Congress shall deem it wise and proper to enforce that penalty.

If this be a fair and correct statement of the law, as I believe it to be, two corollaries necessarily follow:

First. That all provisions in State laws, whether constitutional or statutory, that disfranchise citizens of the United States because of race, color, or previous condition of servitude are void ab initio, and have not now, and have never had, any binding force in law, and can not ever be made the basis of indictment under section 2 of Article XIV.

Second. With the above limitation, any State may withhold the franchise from any of its citizens for any reason that may seem good to it, but when, for any reason whatsoever, it shall deny or in any way abridge the right to vote of any of its male inhabitants 21 years of age and citizens of the United States, except for rebellion or participation in crime, its representation may be reduced by Congress.

What condition of affairs do we find within three decades after these amendments were adopted? An examination of the laws of the various States of the Union will disclose the fact that there is not a single State in all this Republic in which the right to vote of male inhabitants of such State, 21 years of age and citizens of the United States, who are not guilty of rebellion or other crime, is not denied or in some way "abridged" by one or more of the following classes of qualifications:

1. Educational or property qualifications, or both.
2. Prepayment of taxes.
3. Religious belief, or nativity.
4. Australian ballot laws, requiring varying degrees of intelligence and education.

So that, when particular reference is made to the Southern States, we answer that if the charge is made that they violate the fifteenth amendment, that can not be the basis of indictment under the second section of the fourteenth amendment, but it must be a question for the courts alone, in which forum our constitutions and laws have stood every test hitherto imposed upon them or likely to be hereafter made.

If however, you take the other horn of the dilemma and assert that we are subject to the second section of the fourteenth amendment, then I rejoin that every State in the North and West is likewise subject to the same penalty, and that if Congress should be unwise enough to elect to exercise the discretionary power vested in it by section 5 of Article XIV, it will not only be a most serious strain of the present cordial relations so happily existing between the sections, but it will require a readjustment of the basis of representation that will not start at the Potomac and end at the Rio Grande, but will stretch from Hatteras to the Golden Gate, from Maine to Florida, and will embrace in its majestic sweep every State and Territory in the Union, and even our new islands of the sea—for Hawaii has an educational qualification for voting, and is seeking admission to the Union.

So that we would implore the valiant Don Quixotes of this body not to embark on their windmill-crusade, but rather as honest men, who see and know the futility and folly of the law as it is written, and are opposed to keeping among the organic provisions of our national law one that is impossible of enforcement, to join with us in advocating its repeal.

According to the census reports of 1900, there were in the entire Union, at the time the census was taken, almost 9,000,000 negroes, constituting nearly 10 per cent of the total population. Of these 9,000,000 negroes, considerably more than 7,000,000 live in the eleven States that once constituted the Southern Confederacy—namely, the States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Tennessee, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, and Arkansas—where they constituted in the aggregate about one-third of the entire population, varying from 58.7 per cent of the population in Mississippi to 20.4 per cent in Texas.

Nearly a million more negroes live in the four border States of Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, and Pennsylvania, constituting 13.3 per cent of the population in Kentucky, 19.8 per cent of it in Maryland, 5.2 per cent of it in Missouri, and 2.5 per cent of it in Pennsylvania. The remainder of them—a little less than a million in number—are scattered through the balance of the Union among the other thirty States and seven Territories, in numbers varying from nearly 100,000 in New York to 134 in Nevada, but not constituting in the aggregate more than an average of about 2 per cent of the total population of these States and Territories.

In males of voting age the negroes number a little more than 2,000,000 in the entire Union, which is not quite 10 per cent of the total number of males of voting age in the Republic. In the eleven Southern States which I have named they number in the aggregate of voting age over 1,500,000, varying from 223,000 in Georgia to 61,000 in Florida, and constituting in the aggregate 36 per cent of the entire voting strength of these States, varying from 57 per cent in Mississippi to 19 per cent in Texas.

These enormous figures and percentages can not fail to impress any thoughtful man with the magnitude of the problem that they suggest and with the colossal interests involved in it. The 12,000,000 white people of the eleven Southern States named have irrevocably, finally, and almost unanimously determined that they will prevent, by every constitutional means in their power, these people from exercising the elective franchise, and within the last few years this determination has crystallized into action, and to-day throughout the South the great bulk of them are not permitted to vote, being debarred by provisions and qualifications varying in the different States—in some by property or educational qualifications, in others by requiring the prepayment of taxes prior to voting, and in still others by Australian ballot laws that require varying degrees of intelligence, while in some of the States two or more of these methods are adopted.

So far as the fifteenth amendment is concerned, it is not believed by the great majority of our best-informed lawyers and jurists who have given careful thought to the subject that any of these provisions violate the fifteenth amendment, and it is undoubtedly true that they have so far stood every test of the courts. If they do not violate the fifteenth amendment, they can never be held unconstitutional by any court, and if they do violate the second clause of the fourteenth amendment, the States in question have merely subjected themselves to a possible application of the penalty imposed in that amendment, a penalty almost impossible of enforcement, for the reasons I have already suggested, and as I believe any Congress will discover that should be unwise and impolitic enough to attempt to exercise the discretionary and not mandatory power of Article XIV, section 5, by enforcing the penalty prescribed in the second section of the amendment.

In this peculiar situation it is not improper that we should appeal to you to undo the mistakes of the past. Let us repeal laws which permit by indirection that which they were intended to prohibit. Let us return once more to the old constitutional doctrine of our fathers, that representation should be based solely upon population, and that each State should regulate it own election laws, and in the discussion of these great questions in this high tribunal in which the representatives of the whole people ought to sit in solemn impartiality, and in that higher court in which public opinion sits as the final and supreme earthly judge, we submit our contention that the negro can no longer pose as the special ward of the nation or expect partial treatment, but must stand or fall on his merit or demerit as a citizen and voter.

What, then, are the objections to negro suffrage? In the first place, the same objection that applies to all hopeless ignorance, especially when that ignorance is the possession of a people not accustomed to participate in representative government, unacquainted with its institutions, and uninspired by its traditions.

Of the more than a million and a half negro males of voting age, three-fourths of a million of them can neither read nor write. Of Alabama's 181,000, 55.8 per cent are totally illiterate; of Arkansas's 88,000, 40.3 per cent are totally illiterate; of Florida's 61,000, 35.9 per cent are totally illiterate; of Georgia's 223,000, 51.4 per cent are totally illiterate; of Louisiana's 147,000, 58.7 per cent are totally illiterate; of Mississippi's 198,000, 47.5 per cent are totally illiterate; of North Carolina's 127,000, 46.4 per cent are totally illiterate; of South Carolina's 153,000, 50.5 per cent are totally illiterate; of Tennessee's 112,000, 41.4 per cent are totally illiterate; of Texas's 137,000, 37 per cent are totally illiterate, and of Virginia's 146,000, 45 per cent are totally illiterate.

These figures speak to you more eloquently than any words I can utter, and when you remember that the test of literacy and illiteracy, upon which these figures are based, is bare ability to read and write, you can get an inkling as to what the true condition of this race in the South is on this subject; and when you recall that these are statistics taken after more than thirty years of freedom and education, after the States of the South have taxed themselves to exhaustion, and millions of money have been poured out by generous northern philanthropists, for negro education, you will be no longer amazed that the South has at last rid itself to a large extent of this black mass of density and ignorance, who, in the words of one of the recent governors of my State "neither recognize the sanctity of the ballot or realize the responsibilities of citizenship."

But it may be contended that, appalling as is the present illiteracy of the negro, he has made wonderful progress in education, considering his comparatively short opportunity, and is every day more rapidly and more thoroughly fitting himself for his duties as a citizen and voter. I concede the premise that he is reducing his illiteracy at a rapid rate, but the conclusion that he is therefore and thereby fitting himself for his duties and responsibilities as a citizen and voter I flatly dispute and believe I can successfully controvert. Let us examine the census reports as to his educational progress, beginning with 1880, so as to give him a full decade of preparation before any test is applied. In 1880 70 per cent of all the negroes in the Republic were illiterate. In 1890 only 56.8 per cent were illiterate, and in 1900 only 44.6 per cent. In the eleven Southern States the figures are not greatly different from those for the entire nation, the percentage of illiteracy for the negro in those States being 77 per cent in 1880, 63 per cent in 1890, and 49 per cent in 1900. This seems to indicate rapid and gratifying progress. It does undoubtedly indicate progress along educational lines, but does it follow that with his increased education the negro has in like proportion progressed in the acquirement and attainment of those civic and moral qualifications that will render him a better citizen and voter?

Let us see. Let us look into that question. From 1880 to 1890 his illiteracy in the South had decreased from 77 per cent to 63 per cent—a marvelous gain, an absolute decrease of 14 per cent and a relative decrease of 18 per cent. Yet during this same period his criminality increased in more rapid ratio than his illiteracy decreased.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDWICK. No; not at this time. I will ask the gentleman to wait for a moment, and if I have time I will be very glad to answer any question he may propound. I am not at all afraid of the gentleman's question, but I have a certain ground to cover, and then I will take up any question that any gentleman may ask and answer it.

In 1880 there were in these Southern States 2,480 negro prisoners to the million of negro population. In 1890 there were in these States 3,275 negro prisoners to every 1,000,000 of negro population, an absolute increase of 31 per cent in criminality. Still his illiteracy had in this same decade decreased 14 per cent absolutely and 18 per cent relatively. Again in 1880 relative to the white race, and calculating each race upon the basis of population reduced to equality as between each other, the white constituted 27 per cent of the criminal classes of the South and the blacks 73 per cent. Yet in 1890, calculated on this same basis, the whites fell from 27 per cent to 16 per cent, while the negroes advanced from 73 per cent to 84 per cent of the total criminal classes, an absolute increase in criminality on this equalized basis of 11 per cent for the negro and a relative increase of 15 per cent. Yet it must not be forgotten that during this same decade the negro had reduced his illiteracy 14 per cent absolutely and 18 per cent relatively. The Census Bureau has not its criminal statistics compiled for the year 1900, but from 1890 to 1900 the last State reports from the eleven Southern States I have named indicate that these same figures are holding good in that decade.

The conclusion is irresistible that the more you educate the negro the more criminal he becomes. But it may be urged that the negro is unfairly treated in these Southern States; that courts and juries are too prone to look seriously on his faults and to condemn him too hastily and to deal with him too harshly. Let us see. Now, if you will take the criminal statistics from the entire Union and from the different States of the North and different sections of the North and West, you will find that the negro has been punished to a very much greater degree—in other words, is very much more criminal—in the North and West than he has been in the South.

Now, what conclusions are you bound to draw from these figures? There are two. First, that he has not been treated unfairly in the South; and, second, that in the North and West, where he is more educated and less illiterate, he is more criminal. Therefore, as I say, you see everywhere the marvelous spectacle of increased negro criminality and of decreasing negro illiteracy linked together, like Siamese twins, all over this Union. Now, I want to ask this question, and I propound it to every thoughtful, candid man: If it is true that education will not keep the negro from crime, if it is true that decreasing illiteracy does not seem to deter him from criminality, by what extraordinary process of reasoning is the conclusion arrived at that it will make him a better citizen or a better voter?

In this connection let me call to your attention briefly some significant facts and conclusions stated by President Winston, of the Agricultural and Mechanical College of North Carolina, in an exceedingly able paper on this subject, read, I think, before the National Prison Association. The statistics referred to by him are from the census of 1890. Professor Winston discovered the following facts from these reports:

1. The colored element is more criminal than any other in our population.
2. From 1880 to 1890 there was an increase of 33¼ per cent in the ratio of colored criminals to the colored population. In other words, the colored population was one-third more criminal in 1890 than in 1880.
3. While 57 per cent of the colored population are illiterate, only 54 per cent of colored criminals are illiterate. The colored population that can read and write is more criminal than the illiterate. This is not true of any other element in the American population, where the illiterate criminals are in excess of those who can read and write.
4. The ratio of negro criminals and negro paupers is greater in the Northern than in the Southern States. * * * The negro is nearly three times as criminal in the North Atlantic as in the South Atlantic States; over twice as criminal in the North Central as in the South Central, and three and a half times as criminal in the Western as in the South Atlantic States.

Mr. WATSON. Is there anything in those statistics to show what per cent of the Southern——

Mr. HARDWICK. If the gentleman will wait a moment, I will be glad to answer any question when I get through.

Mr. GROSVENOR. But I will state to the gentleman that his time is not nearly up.

Mr. HARDWICK. If I can get a little more time, I will be glad to answer these questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. HARDWICK. If the gentleman will waive his question for a moment or two, I will answer it with pleasure later on. I prefer to go on now.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Of course, I do not wish to do anything at all if it will disconcert the gentleman.

Mr. HARDWICK. Not at all; but for the present I prefer to proceed in my own way.

The next objection I urge to negro suffrage is the almost universal corruptibility of the negro as a voter. There may be exceptions to the rule, more or less numerous in the North and West, and, indeed, a few rare ones in the South, but the rule is that any negro, rich or poor, educated or uneducated, will sell his vote, his chief concern being to obtain the highest possible price for it. I have no statistics to demonstrate this truth, but it needs no demonstration. It is a matter of common knowledge among the people of the South, and I believe this truth is known to people everywhere among whom there are any considerable numbers of negroes, and while I do not positively know it, and hence do not assert it, I surmise very strongly that the gentlemen who have controlled the various national Republican conventions since the negro became a political factor could, if they would, give eloquent evidence in corroboration of it.

The negro, of course, is not solely to blame for this; indeed, he is not even equally to blame with others, for where there is a seller there must be a buyer, and the buyer can not surely be held blameless for his part in such a transaction. But although it is true that the vote buyer ought to be severely punished, it is equally true that the vote seller should be forever disfranchised. Indeed, the disfranchisement of those voters whom we know do sell out is the only effectual cure for this great cancer on the national body politic. From the very nature of the transaction, from its secrecy, from the penalties attached to it, and from the opprobrium incurred by it, it is a transaction rarely susceptible, under ordinary circumstances, of proof, and hence the ordinary penalties usually provided by law can rarely be enforced.

I contend that certain truths that I now propose to state are axiomatic and undeniable. What are these truths? They are these: That the right to vote is not an absolute natural right that exists for the benefit of the individual, but a great civil and political privilege, conferred or withheld for the benefit of and in the interest of society and good government, and that men who so little appreciate their votes as to sell them ought to be deprived of them forever; and from these propositions I draw the necessary conclusion, in the light of the South's unvarying experience with the negro vote, that the negro ought to be disfranchised.

There is another and, if possible, a still more weighty reason why I oppose negro suffrage. The natural, indeed the irresistible, tendency of political equality is toward social equality. No two races have ever yet lived side by side in anything like equal numbers on terms of political and social equality without amalgamation. All history proclaims the truth of this doctrine, without an exception in any age or in any clime.

Amalgamation being impossible so long as there is a single drop of blood in the veins of a single southern white man, it follows that there can be neither social nor political equality between the races; that so long as they live together there must be the positions of superior and inferior, and that the white race will demand and take the superior position is beyond controversy. Six thousand years of history proclaim his right to it. Superior mental and moral force assert it. Justice and equity unite in confirming his title to it in this land that his adventurous ancestors discovered and conquered from its savage inhabitants, wrested from foreign tyranny, and in which they have founded and preserved that Government that is to-day the richest, the most powerful, and the most glorious on earth.

And who is the negro that he should dispute this demand? A race that never yet founded a government or built a state that did not soon lapse into barbarism; a race that never yet made a single step toward civilization, except under the fostering care and guidance of the white man; a race into whose care was committed one of the three great continents, and who has made it ever since the remotest times a land of utter darkness, until to-day the nations of Europe, in the onward march of irresistible civilization, are dividing his heritage, the greatest of the continents, among themselves. But why multiply words? It may be thought that because I am from the South and intensely southern I have an undue amount of race prejudice. I will therefore for the moment suspend my own argument and summon to my aid an illustrious advocate, one of the most illustrious, living or dead, that this country ever produced. Hear his argument, for he presents the argument I fain would make to-day, and voices with a terseness and strength I can never hope to equal the sentiments of my people.

On October 16, 1854, in a speech at Freeport, Ill., Abraham Lincoln said:

> What next? Free them [referring to the negroes] and make them politically and socially our equals? My own feelings will not admit of this, and if they would we all know that those of the great mass of the whites will not. Whether this feeling accords with justice and sound doctrine is not the sole question, if indeed it is any part of it. A universal feeling, whether well or ill founded, can not be disregarded.

During this same Freeport speech Mr. Lincoln also said:

> Let it not be said that I am contending for the establishment of political and social equality between the whites and blacks. I have already said the contrary.

that we are subject to the second section of the fourteenth amendment, then I rejoin that every State in the North and West is likewise subject to the same penalty, and that if Congress should be unwise enough to elect to exercise the discretionary power vested in it by section 5 of Article XIV, it will not only be a most serious strain of the present cordial relations so happily existing between the sections, but it will require a readjustment of the basis of representation that will not start at the Potomac and end at the Rio Grande, but will stretch from Hatteras to the Golden Gate, from Maine to Florida, and will embrace in its majestic sweep every State and Territory in the Union, and even our new islands of the sea—for Hawaii has an educational qualification for voting, and is seeking admission to the Union.

So that we would implore the valiant Don Quixotes of this body not to embark on their windmill-crusade, but rather as honest men, who see and know the futility and folly of the law as it is written, and are opposed to keeping among the organic provisions of our national law one that is impossible of enforcement, to join with us in advocating its repeal.

According to the census reports of 1900, there were in the entire Union, at the time the census was taken, almost 9,000,000 negroes, constituting nearly 10 per cent of the total population. Of these 9,000,000 negroes, considerably more than 7,000,000 live in the eleven States that once constituted the Southern Confederacy—namely, the States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Tennessee, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, and Arkansas—where they constituted in the aggregate about one-third of the entire population, varying from 58.7 per cent of the population in Mississippi to 20.4 per cent in Texas.

Nearly a million more negroes live in the four border States of Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, and Pennsylvania, constituting 13.3 per cent of the population in Kentucky, 19.8 per cent of it in Maryland, 5.2 per cent of it in Missouri, and 2.5 per cent of it in Pennsylvania. The remainder of them—a little less than a million in number—are scattered through the balance of the Union among the other thirty States and seven Territories, in numbers varying from nearly 100,000 in New York to 134 in Nevada, but not constituting in the aggregate more than an average of about 2 per cent of the total population of these States and Territories.

In males of voting age the negroes number a little more than 2,000,000 in the entire Union, which is not quite 10 per cent of the total number of males of voting age in the Republic. In the eleven Southern States which I have named they number in the aggregate of voting age over 1,500,000, varying from 223,000 in Georgia to 61,000 in Florida, and constituting in the aggregate 36 per cent of the entire voting strength of these States, varying from 57 per cent in Mississippi to 19 per cent in Texas.

These enormous figures and percentages can not fail to impress any thoughtful man with the magnitude of the problem that they suggest and with the colossal interests involved in it. The 12,000,000 white people of the eleven Southern States named have irrevocably, finally, and almost unanimously determined that they will prevent, by every constitutional means in their power, these people from exercising the elective franchise, and within the last few years this determination has crystallized into action, and to-day throughout the South the great bulk of them are not permitted to vote, being debarred by provisions and qualifications varying in the different States—in some by property or educational qualifications, in others by requiring the prepayment of taxes prior to voting, and in still others by Australian ballot laws that require varying degrees of intelligence, while in some of the States two or more of these methods are adopted.

So far as the fifteenth amendment is concerned, it is not believed by the great majority of our best-informed lawyers and jurists who have given careful thought to the subject that any of these provisions violate the fifteenth amendment, and it is undoubtedly true that they have so far stood every test of the courts. If they do not violate the fifteenth amendment, they can never be held unconstitutional by any court, and if they do violate the second clause of the fourteenth amendment, the States in question have merely subjected themselves to a possible application of the penalty imposed in that amendment, a penalty almost impossible of enforcement, for the reasons I have already suggested, and as I believe any Congress will discover that should be unwise and impolitic enough to attempt to exercise the discretionary and not mandatory power of Article XIV, section 5, by enforcing the penalty prescribed in the second section of the amendment.

In this peculiar situation it is not improper that we should appeal to you to undo the mistakes of the past. Let us repeal laws which permit by indirection that which they were intended to prohibit. Let us return once more to the old constitutional doctrine of our fathers, that representation should be based solely upon population, and that each State should regulate it own election laws, and in the discussion of these great questions in this high tribunal in which the representatives of the whole people ought to sit in solemn impartiality, and in that higher court in which public opinion sits as the final and supreme earthly judge, we submit our contention that the negro can no longer pose as the special ward of the nation or expect partial treatment, but must stand or fall on his merit or demerit as a citizen and voter.

What, then, are the objections to negro suffrage? In the first place, the same objection that applies to all hopeless ignorance, especially when that ignorance is the possession of a people not accustomed to participate in representative government, unacquainted with its institutions, and uninspired by its traditions.

Of the more than a million and a half negro males of voting age, three-fourths of a million of them can neither read nor write. Of Alabama's 181,000, 55.8 per cent are totally illiterate; of Arkansas's 88,000, 40.3 per cent are totally illiterate; of Florida's 61,000, 35.9 per cent are totally illiterate; of Georgia's 223,000, 51.4 per cent are totally illiterate; of Louisiana's 147,000, 58.7 per cent are totally illiterate; of Mississippi's 198,000, 47.5 per cent are totally illiterate; of North Carolina's 127,000, 46.4 per cent are totally illiterate; of South Carolina's 153,000, 50.5 per cent are totally illiterate; of Tennessee's 112,000, 41.4 per cent are totally illiterate; of Texas's 137,000, 37 per cent are totally illiterate, and of Virginia's 146,000, 45 per cent are totally illiterate.

These figures speak to you more eloquently than any words I can utter, and when you remember that the test of literacy and illiteracy, upon which these figures are based, is bare ability to read and write, you can get an inkling as to what the true condition of this race in the South is on this subject; and when you recall that these are statistics taken after more than thirty years of freedom and education, after the States of the South have taxed themselves to exhaustion, and millions of money have been poured out by generous northern philanthropists, for negro education, you will be no longer amazed that the South has at last rid itself to a large extent of this black mass of density and ignorance, who, in the words of one of the recent governors of my State "neither recognize the sanctity of the ballot or realize the responsibilities of citizenship."

But it may be contended that, appalling as is the present illiteracy of the negro, he has made wonderful progress in education, considering his comparatively short opportunity, and is every day more rapidly and more thoroughly fitting himself for his duties as a citizen and voter. I concede the premise that he is reducing his illiteracy at a rapid rate, but the conclusion that he is therefore and thereby fitting himself for his duties and responsibilities as a citizen and voter I flatly dispute and believe I can successfully controvert. Let us examine the census reports as to his educational progress, beginning with 1880, so as to give him a full decade of preparation before any test is applied. In 1880 70 per cent of all the negroes in the Republic were illiterate. In 1890 only 56.8 per cent were illiterate, and in 1900 only 44.6 per cent. In the eleven Southern States the figures are not greatly different from those for the entire nation, the percentage of illiteracy for the negro in those States being 77 per cent in 1880, 63 per cent in 1890, and 49 per cent in 1900. This seems to indicate rapid and gratifying progress. It does undoubtedly indicate progress along educational lines, but does it follow that with his increased education the negro has in like proportion progressed in the acquirement and attainment of those civic and moral qualifications that will render him a better citizen and voter?

Let us see. Let us look into that question. From 1880 to 1890 his illiteracy in the South had decreased from 77 per cent to 63 per cent—a marvelous gain, an absolute decrease of 14 per cent and a relative decrease of 18 per cent. Yet during this same period his criminality increased in more rapid ratio than his illiteracy decreased.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDWICK. No; not at this time. I will ask the gentleman to wait for a moment, and if I have time I will be very glad to answer any question he may propound. I am not at all afraid of the gentleman's question, but I have a certain ground to cover, and then I will take up any question that any gentleman may ask and answer it.

In 1880 there were in these Southern States 2,480 negro prisoners to the million of negro population. In 1890 there were in these States 3,275 negro prisoners to every 1,000,000 of negro population, an absolute increase of 31 per cent in criminality. Still his illiteracy had in this same decade decreased 14 per cent absolutely and 18 per cent relatively. Again in 1880 relative to the white race, and calculating each race upon the basis of population reduced to equality as between each other, the white constituted 27 per cent of the criminal classes of the South and the blacks 73 per cent. Yet in 1890, calculated on this same basis, the whites fell from 27 per cent to 16 per cent, while the negroes advanced from 73 per cent to 84 per cent of the total criminal classes, an absolute increase in criminality on this equalized basis of 11 per cent for the negro and a relative increase of 15 per cent. Yet it must not be forgotten that during this same decade the negro had reduced his illiteracy 14 per cent absolutely and 18 per cent relatively. The Census Bureau has not its criminal statistics compiled for the year 1900, but from 1890 to 1900 the last State reports from the eleven Southern States I have named indicate that these same figures are holding good in that decade.

The conclusion is irresistible that the more you educate the negro the more criminal he becomes. But it may be urged that the negro is unfairly treated in these Southern States; that courts and juries are too prone to look seriously on his faults and to condemn him too hastily and to deal with him too harshly. Let us see. Now, if you will take the criminal statistics from the entire Union and from the different States of the North and different sections of the North and West, you will find that the negro has been punished to a very much greater degree—in other words, is very much more criminal—in the North and West than he has been in the South.

Now, what conclusions are you bound to draw from these figures? There are two. First, that he has not been treated unfairly in the South; and, second, that in the North and West, where he is more educated and less illiterate, he is more criminal. Therefore, as I say, you see everywhere the marvelous spectacle of increased negro criminality and of decreasing negro illiteracy linked together, like Siamese twins, all over this Union. Now, I want to ask this question, and I propound it to every thoughtful, candid man: If it is true that education will not keep the negro from crime, if it is true that decreasing illiteracy does not seem to deter him from criminality, by what extraordinary process of reasoning is the conclusion arrived at that it will make him a better citizen or a better voter?

In this connection let me call to your attention briefly some significant facts and conclusions stated by President Winston, of the Agricultural and Mechanical College of North Carolina, in an exceedingly able paper on this subject, read, I think, before the National Prison Association. The statistics referred to by him are from the census of 1890. Professor Winston discovered the following facts from these reports:

1. The colored element is more criminal than any other in our population.
2. From 1880 to 1890 there was an increase of 33½ per cent in the ratio of colored criminals to the colored population. In other words, the colored population was one-third more criminal in 1890 than in 1880.
3. While 57 per cent of the colored population are illiterate, only 54 per cent of colored criminals are illiterate. The colored population that can read and write is more criminal than the illiterate. This is not true of any other element in the American population, where the illiterate criminals are in excess of those who can read and write.
4. The ratio of negro criminals and negro paupers is greater in the Northern than in the Southern States. * * * The negro is nearly three times as criminal in the North Atlantic as in the South Atlantic States; over twice as criminal in the North Central as in the South Central, and three and a half times as criminal in the Western as in the South Atlantic States.

Mr. WATSON. Is there anything in those statistics to show what per cent of the Southern——

Mr. HARDWICK. If the gentleman will wait a moment, I will be glad to answer any question when I get through.

Mr. GROSVENOR. But I will state to the gentleman that his time is not nearly up.

Mr. HARDWICK. If I can get a little more time, I will be glad to answer these questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. HARDWICK. If the gentleman will waive his question for a moment or two, I will answer it with pleasure later on. I prefer to go on now.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Of course, I do not wish to do anything at all if it will disconcert the gentleman.

Mr. HARDWICK. Not at all; but for the present I prefer to proceed in my own way.

The next objection I urge to negro suffrage is the almost universal corruptibility of the negro as a voter. There may be exceptions to the rule, more or less numerous in the North and West, and, indeed, a few rare ones in the South, but the rule is that any negro, rich or poor, educated or uneducated, will sell his vote, his chief concern being to obtain the highest possible price for it. I have no statistics to demonstrate this truth, but it needs no demonstration. It is a matter of common knowledge among the people of the South, and I believe this truth is known to people everywhere among whom there are any considerable numbers of negroes, and while I do not positively know it, and hence do not assert it, I surmise very strongly that the gentlemen who have controlled the various national Republican conventions since the negro became a political factor could, if they would, give eloquent evidence in corroboration of it.

The negro, of course, is not solely to blame for this; indeed, he is not even equally to blame with others, for where there is a seller there must be a buyer, and the buyer can not surely be held blameless for his part in such a transaction. But although it is true that the vote buyer ought to be severely punished, it is equally true that the vote seller should be forever disfranchised. Indeed, the disfranchisement of those voters whom we know do sell out is the only effectual cure for this great cancer on the national body politic. From the very nature of the transaction, from its secrecy, from the penalties attached to it, and from the opprobrium incurred by it, it is a transaction rarely susceptible, under ordinary circumstances, of proof, and hence the ordinary penalties usually provided by law can rarely be enforced.

I contend that certain truths that I now propose to state are axiomatic and undeniable. What are these truths? They are these: That the right to vote is not an absolute natural right that exists for the benefit of the individual, but a great civil and political privilege, conferred or withheld for the benefit of and in the interest of society and good government, and that men who so little appreciate their votes as to sell them ought to be deprived of them forever; and from these propositions I draw the necessary conclusion, in the light of the South's unvarying experience with the negro vote, that the negro ought to be disfranchised.

There is another and, if possible, a still more weighty reason why I oppose negro suffrage. The natural, indeed the irresistible, tendency of political equality is toward social equality. No two races have ever yet lived side by side in anything like equal numbers on terms of political and social equality without amalgamation. All history proclaims the truth of this doctrine, without an exception in any age or in any clime.

Amalgamation being impossible so long as there is a single drop of blood in the veins of a single southern white man, it follows that there can be neither social nor political equality between the races; that so long as they live together there must be the positions of superior and inferior, and that the white race will demand and take the superior position is beyond controversy. Six thousand years of history proclaim his right to it. Superior mental and moral force assert it. Justice and equity unite in confirming his title to it in this land that his adventurous ancestors discovered and conquered from its savage inhabitants, wrested from foreign tyranny, and in which they have founded and preserved that Government that is to-day the richest, the most powerful, and the most glorious on earth.

And who is the negro that he should dispute this demand? A race that never yet founded a government or built a state that did not soon lapse into barbarism; a race that never yet made a single step toward civilization, except under the fostering care and guidance of the white man; a race into whose care was committed one of the three great continents, and who has made it ever since the remotest times a land of utter darkness, until to-day the nations of Europe, in the onward march of irresistible civilization, are dividing his heritage, the greatest of the continents, among themselves. But why multiply words? It may be thought that because I am from the South and intensely southern I have an undue amount of race prejudice. I will therefore for the moment suspend my own argument and summon to my aid an illustrious advocate, one of the most illustrious, living or dead, that this country ever produced. Hear his argument, for he presents the argument I fain would make to-day, and voices with a terseness and strength I can never hope to equal the sentiments of my people.

> What next? Free them [referring to the negroes] and make them politically and socially our equals? My own feelings will not admit of this, and if they would we all know that those of the great mass of the whites will not. Whether this feeling accords with justice and sound doctrine is not the sole question, if indeed it is any part of it. A universal feeling, whether well or ill founded, can not be disregarded.

During this same Freeport speech Mr. Lincoln also said:

> Let it not be said that I am contending for the establishment of political and social equality between the whites and blacks. I have already said the contrary.

During the same speech he also used these words:

Senator Douglas remarked in substance that he had always considered this Government made for the white people and not for the negroes. Why, in point of fact, I think so, too.

It will thus be observed that on three separate occasions during this one speech Mr. Lincoln impressed upon the people his opposition to social and political equality between the races.

In 1858 Mr. Lincoln and Judge Douglas engaged in that memorable contest for the Illinois Senatorship that attracted the attention of the nation; memorable because of the magnificent abilities of the two mighty gladiators, as well as the tremendous issues involved. During this joint discussion Mr. Lincoln took pains on two separate occasions to express and emphasize his irrevocable opposition to negro suffrage.

In the Ottawa discussion, August 21, 1858, Mr. Lincoln said:

I have no purpose to introduce political and social equality between the white and black races. There is a physical difference between the two, which, in my judgment, will probably forbid their ever living together on terms of perfect equality, and inasmuch as it becomes a necessity that there must be a difference, I, as well as Judge Douglas, am in favor of the race to which I belong having the superior position.

Again, in the Charleston debate, September 18, 1858, Mr. Lincoln used these words:

I will say, then, that I am not, nor ever have been, in favor of bringing about the political and social equality of the white and black races; that I am not, nor ever have been, in favor of making voters or jurors out of negroes, or of qualifying them to hold office, or to intermarry with white people; and I will say in addition to this that there is a physical difference between the white and black races, which will, I believe, forever forbid the two races from living together on terms of social and political equality, and inasmuch as they can not so live, while they do live together there must be the position of superior and inferior, and I, as much as any other man, am in favor of having the superior position assigned to the white race.

Who can add to the force, simplicity, and strength of this language? I can not hope to do so; I can only commend it to the thoughtful consideration of all the people of the Union, and especially would I commend the words of this great statesman, who came out of the great Middle West, to these latter-day statesmen, who come to-day out of the great Middle West with lances in rest, to take a tilt at the South.

But it may be asked, what then of the negro; you take from him the ballot that was conferred upon him for the preservation of his freedom and the protection of his civil rights—what substitute do you propose?

The answer is simple. His civil rights are forever secured to him by section 1 of the fourteenth amendment, and so far as the South is concerned I wish to say this, that with his political inferiority established and his social ambition checked he will quietly and peaceably assume that inferior position for which nature and training have fitted him, and so long as he is in their midst the people of the South, who understand him better and treat him more fairly than any other people on earth, and who have for him, in his proper place, a real regard, will see to it that his civil rights are safeguarded and protected—those civil rights that they have never been disposed to deny him since his emancipation, the right to have a fair and impartial trial in the courts, to labor when and where he pleases without abuse or molestation, the security of personal liberty, and the preservation of private property, as well as assistance to material progress and encouragement to the cultivation of those civic virtues that adorn every good citizen, high or low, and whose absence is a reproach to the mightiest.

The objection may be made that this system proposes to tax him without giving him a voice in the Government. The answer is that taxation and the right to vote have never been coincident in any government, and have never been in this Government. Is a negro man better than a white woman? Yet you tax the woman who owns property and in only two or three States out of forty-five do you permit her to vote.

The objection may be made that this system denies the elective franchise to the negro, and yet military service may be required of him. The answer is that military service and the right to vote have never gone hand in hand, even in this Government. Boys between 18 and 21 years of age are subject to military service, and yet they are not permitted to vote, and men over 45 years of age are exempt from military service, and yet they are permitted to vote.

More than twenty years ago the Hon. James G. Blaine predicted that there could be no further amendment to the national Constitution, except, possibly, in the event of a "political convulsion." This is probably the true rule, and the probability is that there will be no amendment on the suffrage question, unless race friction should in the future produce some horrible "convulsion" that will shake the nation and shock the world. In that event I do not doubt that a Caucasianism that will know no North, East, West, or South, but will bind all the white people of the Union together in bonds of blood and brotherhood, will spring into instant life, brush from its path all opposing forces, and sweep these amendments from our Constitution by unanimous vote.

I am not without hope, even under ordinary conditions, as to the ultimate success of the cause I advocate to-day. I can not despair when I recall that not many months have passed since the Republican Secretary of War, Mr. Root, addressing this same Union League Club in New York City, admitted that the experiment of negro suffrage had failed and that the country must realize its failure and prepare to consider next what new remedy could be proposed for existing conditions.

I can not despair when not many months have elapsed since the New York Sun, one of the greatest and most influential papers in the nation, Republican in its politics, but a brave, independent paper, with convictions of its own—and it is not afraid to express them—admits the tremendous mistake that was made in 1869 and 1870, and plainly says that "sooner or later the country will have to face the question of the repeal of the fifteenth amendment, and perhaps the sooner the better for the dignity of the instrument, which exhibits as a fundamental principle of the American system a theory of suffrage impossible of practical application with safety to the vital interests of the States chiefly concerned;" when this view of the matter seems to be indorsed by such widely read journals as Harper's Weekly, the Public Ledger of Philadelphia, the Providence Journal, and a large number of other northern and western papers and magazines; when this view is advocated and supported by such well-known sociologists as Prof. Leon Prince, Prof. Jerome Dowd, Prof. Goldwin Smith, Mr. A. R. Colquhoun, Rev. Dr. Parkhurst, and others.

Well has it been suggested that it is the most brazen of inconsistencies for the National Government to guarantee the suffrage to black men in the South while it denies it to brown men in the Philippines and to white men in Porto Rico.

These amendments were adopted at a time when party feeling ran high, when sectional bitterness filled the land, when almost every family both at the North and the South was mourning some loved one lost in the civil war, and men therefore were not prepared to speak or vote calmly and reasonably. They were adopted at a time when the leaders of the radical wing of the Republican party had the bleeding and prostrate South under foot and the balance of the nation at their beck and call, and, intoxicated with success and drunk with power, sought to perpetuate their party in control of the National Government, and yet, even under all these circumstances, the adoption of these amendments was accomplished against the express will of the majority of the people of the Union by treachery in the North and by force in the South.

If the people of the Union, even in those days when passions were hot, were unwilling to revolutionize their constitutional system by taking from the States the right to control this suffrage question, can it be possible that now, when the soothing hand of time has healed the wounds that were then smarting, when the people of the South have demonstrated once more in blood and fire their loyalty to the Union and her sons have marched side by side with the sons of the North, of the East, and of the West against a common foe, the fight against these iniquitous amendments is more hopeless than it was in the days of their adoption? I must confess I can not so view it.

The North and East are struggling to-day with mighty suffrage problems of their own. The great West has its burdens. The Chinese are swarming to the Pacific slope; every day is bringing thoughtful men of all parties, of all sections, and of all States closer together in the belief that North, East, West, and South must all have protection from the dangers that menace each section from ignorance and corruption at the polls; that the kind of protection that each Commonwealth requires is varied by many local conditions peculiar to itself, and that for these reasons there ought to be a return to the old compact of our fathers—to the ancient landmarks of the Republic. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Georgia to a statement he made in regard to the word "white" in the constitution of the State of Ohio.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will put it in the form of a question, if the gentleman will permit me.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And of course the gentleman can answer it or let my statement go for the answer.

Mr. HARDWICK. I will answer, if I can and have the time, any question that is propounded.

Mr. GROSVENOR. In 1867 the word "white" was in the constitution of Ohio, fixing the qualification of the voter. It had been put there in the constitution of 1851.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is right, sir.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That constitution was adopted by a Democratic convention. In 1867 a constitutional amendment was submitted to the people of Ohio to strike out the word "white" from the constitution.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The Democratic party denounced that proposition in its platform and nominated Judge Thurman for governor. The Republican party advocated that proposition and nominated President Hayes, then a citizen of Ohio, for governor of the State. The fight was made very bitterly all over the State, and the proposition was defeated, although Hayes was elected governor by a small majority. Thurman was afterwards elected to the United States Senate by the legislature, which was Democratic. Then came the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution, which rendered it unnecessary to agitate the question of striking out the word "white," and hence it has stood there ever since. Is that a correct statement of history, as the gentleman finds it?

Mr. HARDWICK. It is a correct statement with one exception, that in the same year that the white people of the State of Ohio elected the Republican candidate for governor, instead of giving a small majority against striking out the word "white" they gave a majority of 50,629 against it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. I did not say anything about the size of the majority.

Mr. HARDWICK. I thought you said a small majority.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I said Hayes was elected governor by only a very small majority—about a thousand.

Mr. CLARK. Fifteen hundred.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Quite true.

Mr. HARDWICK. Answering the gentleman's question, the majority against striking out that one word "white," on the last vote ever taken by the people of the State of Ohio, was 50,629.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That was not the last vote ever taken.

Mr. HARDWICK. On that subject.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Not the last vote, because they submitted a new constitution in 1874.

Mr. HARDWICK. It did not have anything about that, though.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It did not have the word "white" in it.

Mr. HARDWICK. No; but has not the organic law of your State the word "white" in it now? Is not that in the Ohio constitution which is now in force?

Mr. GROSVENOR. We were submitting a constitution then.

Mr. HARDWICK. It was rejected.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The whole Constitution was rejected. That is all. I only wanted to get that much in as to the fact. I did not want to disturb the current of your speech——

Mr. HARDWICK. Not at all.

Mr. GROSVENOR (continuing). Which I will say I think is the best presentation of a bad cause that I have ever heard. [Applause.]

Mr. HARDWICK. I very much appreciate the gentleman's compliment. Now, just one other word. Of course the gentleman will claim that the Democrats did it, but as a matter of fact——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, no; I do not claim it——

Mr. HARDWICK. But about this statement I am now going to make, which the gentleman has not heard.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will hear your statement.

Mr. HARDWICK. I say I know you will claim that the Democrats did it, because I think it is true that they did it. It is a matter of fact that according to the records the State of Ohio, by the action of its legislature, attempted to reject or to reconsider—they said it could not be done—its agreement to the fifteenth amendment.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The fourteenth. I think they rejected the fifteenth amendment.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; and you withdrew your assent to the fourteenth.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That was Democratic politics.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; I knew you would say that. I think it was very good politics.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. It was the will of the people of the State of Ohio.

Mr. WATSON. I should like to ask the gentleman a question or two.

Mr. HARDWICK. If I have the time.

Mr. WATSON. The gentleman spoke of the criminal classes among the negroes, and discussed the question whether the persons who committed the crimes were educated or illiterate negroes.

Mr. HARDWICK. The report published by the president of the Agricultural and Mechanical College of North Carolina is the only report I have been able to find that gives the number of educated and the number of uneducated negro criminals. You will find it in that report.

Mr. WATSON. But in no other State?

Mr. HARDWICK. It gives it for the entire Union and every State in it.

Mr. WATSON. Now, I should like to ask this further question: The gentleman has stated that increasing education among the negroes makes an increasing tendency to crime?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. And an increasing number of criminals.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. Does the gentleman as a necessary sequitur to that statement believe in the discontinuance of all schools for the education of the colored people of the South? Does he believe in the discontinuance of the institute at Tuscogee, Ala., and does he believe in the discontinuance of the publication of all magazines and newspapers by and for the colored people?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HARDWICK. If I had time I would like to answer the gentleman.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. HARDWICK. I will answer the gentleman—certainly not. But here is what I do say: The ordinary education of the negro, and certainly the higher education of the negro—I mean the college education, Greek and Latin, and the higher education—at least unfits him for work. It discontents him with conditions. It makes him ambitious to do things that he can not do in the South or in any other part of this country and to gratify aspirations that no white people will ever permit him to gratify, and for that reason education of that character is not beneficial to him, in my humble judgment.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I now yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. HARDWICK. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. GROSVENOR having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose in the thirty minutes kindly allotted me by the gentleman in charge of this bill to make a political speech. In other words, I do not think political speeches amount to much here. They are made upon one side and answered upon the other, and it is virtually a throwing backward and forward of something that has no material effect upon this body. Evidently they are made for the purpose of distribution at home, for the purpose of vote getting there; but as I understand it, the Members who have been elected to this Congress are here for the purpose of doing business, for the purpose of legislating for their country, and as they fulfill that measure their works will stand or fall. If they have legislated in a way that is contrary to the wishes of the people, as I understand it, the people, when they have an opportunity to express themselves at the polls, will, by their ballots, condemn their conduct here and will pay no special attention to any speech which has been made for political purposes only.

But, sir, a few things have been said along political lines that I beg the pardon of the committee for alluding to. This morning the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT] said the Democratic party while in possession of the affairs of the Government conducted them in such a manner that it did not have money enough to do the business of the country and hence failed as an Administration. Sir, I understand from the history of the country that when Mr. Cleveland was elected President in 1884, the first Democratic President that the country had seen since Mr. Buchanan yielded to Abraham Lincoln in 1861, the Treasury of the Government was depleted to a point that greatly embarrassed it in the discharge of the duties devolving upon it, and that Mr. Cleveland took charge of it in that condition and during his four years of service as President of the Union he accumulated quite a large amount of revenue, called "the surplus." I remember full well that during the campaign of 1888 the question was often asked, "What shall we do with the surplus?"

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I understand the gentleman to say that that was the cry at the end of Cleveland's Administration—that he had accumulated a revenue. It was really the cry at the end of Cleveland's first Administration.

Mr. MACON. Yes, that was the cry even before the end of Cleveland's first Administration. Mr. Harrison then came into office as a Republican President and at a time when the whole country was wondering what was to be done with the surplus that the Democratic President had, by an economical and honest administration, accumulated within the period of four years. But the question as to the disposition of it was settled as soon as it was known that Mr. Harrison had been elected. The cry that went up was, "God save the surplus!" We all remember that. It had gone into the hands of the Republican party. Therefore the expression so universally heard, "God save the surplus!" During the Administration of Mr. Harrison we know that the surplus was exhausted and that when he went out of office he had directed that plates be prepared with which to print bonds for the purpose of getting money to run the affairs of the Government upon, and we all know that Mr. Harrison attributed his defeat for a second term to the depressed times, the hard conditions of our country, and the scarcity of money to do the business of the country upon. That was what he was defeated on by Mr. Cleveland in 1892.

Therefore I say, gentlemen, that the charges made upon the other side of the House to the effect that when Democracy was in power we wasted the surplus of the country and so administered the affairs of the Government that it did not have money enough to do the business of the country upon is contrary to the history of the country as it existed at the time.

If I am wrong in my declarations I specifically invite some one upon the Republican side to correct me in regard thereto. Mr. Cleveland then came into office on March 4, 1893, for a second Administration. He again found the Treasury in a depleted condition, with stamps already made for the purpose of issuing bonds to be sold to get money to administer the affairs of the Government upon, and that, too, during a period of absolute peace.

But, sirs, I do not want to dwell upon the subject of politics. I am simply repeating some of the arguments offered by the gentleman from Nebraska this morning, and offering such refutations thereto as are warranted by the facts in the case; and, sirs, I now repeat that if I am incorrect in my statements about conditions that existed during the periods mentioned, you now and here have opportunity to show that I am not stating the facts as shown by the records of our country. It is not my purpose to deceive—to argue against facts as they existed at the time and as they are expressed upon the pages of history.

I heard the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL] deliver a speech on yesterday that I enjoyed from the moment he parted his lips until he closed them, and just here I want to say I have heard a great many good things come from the Republican side of this Congress since I have been a Member of it, and if you will pardon me and not consider that I am speaking for personal purposes, I will say that my estimate of the Members who sit on the Republican side of the House has been considerably elevated since I have had the pleasure of associating with them. [Applause from the Republican side.] I believe, sirs, that you intend to do right, and that if you do wrong, in the main, it is because of erroneous ideas and faulty judgment. But now and then we find an individual Member upon that side who, for "Cheap John" political purposes, makes declarations that are not borne out by the facts, and hence it becomes necessary for us who occupy the minority side to resist such things in so far as to deny them and to furnish facts to refute them, and that far it pleases me to go, but no further.

As I said, I enjoyed the speech of the gentleman from Illinois yesterday, and I especially enjoyed that part of it that referred to the great prosperity of Arkansas. Arkansas, in my judgment, is one of the greatest States in the matter of natural resources and good citizenship that the world has ever known. She is only lacking in development, but the time has come when her superior resources are being made known everywhere, and men of means and sense are flocking to her plains and peaks to take advantage of the wonderful opportunities she is unfolding to eager humanity. She is beckoning men from every land and every clime to come to her rich fields and splendid mines and dwell among her happy people. I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois, however, that the prosperous condition that he spoke of as existing in Arkansas does not result from the high protective tariff of the Republican party.

I defy him to point to a single community in the State of Arkansas that has been benefited, to the extent that he contends, by reason of the Dingley tariff act. Our prosperity has been produced by the strong and willing arms of those who hold the plow, pick the cotton, husk the corn, and dig deep into the mines. We have increased that prosperity by reason of the fact that we have an economical people—a people who are willing to struggle and to strive in order to benefit their condition—and all they ask in this world is that you keep your hands off of them and allow them to run the race of life as God Almighty intended them to run it, untrammeled by interference from the outside. In regard to the question of which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] has just spoken—the negro question—I will say that if you will let Arkansas alone she will take care of the negro question, and she will do it without prejudice to the negro. Nobody can say here or elsewhere that Arkansas has ever enacted a law that denies the negro an equal right with me in the worship of God, the pursuit of happiness, or the acquisition of property.

Her election law provides that the negro who pays his poll tax as I do has the same right to go to the polls and vote that I have, and, sirs, the amount paid as a poll tax goes to the common school fund, for the purpose of educating his children along with mine, and therefore I say that nothing that has been said upon the floor of this House concerning election laws or the negro question can possibly be turned upon my great State. Her policy is to do right along all lines, and all she asks is, as I said a moment ago, that you let her alone and let her administer her own affairs in her own way, and she will do it without prejudice to any of the peoples of the earth. She allows you to proceed in your own way about all matters and things that concern your own States and is not impudent enough to make suggestions to you or offer interference in connection therewith.

We have had the negro among us all of our days, and you can not find a true southern man in that State that will not fight for him when he sees that his rights are being imposed upon. When free from the influences of "long-haired men and short-haired women," the negro is happy and contented, and they go to their worship or their toil with a song upon their lips and a smile upon their faces. Let the colored people of Arkansas alone, and they will never rise up and complain of the conduct of a truly southern soul.

Mr. Chairman, I beg pardon for the digression that I have made in my speech. I did not rise to make a political speech or a speech upon the negro question. My purpose is to present a question to the House that I consider of much greater consequence, of a much higher and more holy character than either of the questions that I have just touched upon. I introduced a bill in this Congress, the title of which reads as follows:

To prohibit the granting or issuing of revenue license for the sale or giving away of intoxicating liquors, wines, spirits, etc., in any district or territory of any of the several States or Territories of the United States of America where the sale or giving away of such intoxicating liquors, wines, spirits, etc., are prohibited by the laws of said States or Territories.

Various States in this Union have enacted laws governing the question of issuing a license to sell intoxicating liquors. In the State of Arkansas, that I speak for directly, it is provided by State enactment that where a majority of the voters of a township or county express themselves against license none shall be issued in said township or county. It is provided further that where a majority of the adult residents in a given locality petition the county court against the issuing of license for the sale of liquors within 3 miles of a given schoolhouse or church that none shall be issued. About one-half of the counties of the State have said by their votes that they are opposed to the issuing of a license to sell liquors in their respective communities. Many of the counties that have not so expressed themselves at the polls have within their borders churches and schoolhouses, a majority of whose adult attendants and patrons have signed a petition against the issuing of license to sell liquor within the 3-mile territory, and the various county courts have entered orders prohibiting the sale thereof in accordance therewith.

If the States are left to themselves they can be very effective in the matter of enforcing their local-option laws, but when interferred with by the issuing of a national license by the Government to sell liquor in the prohibited territory they have an uphill pull along that line. In morals, when the Government issues a license to sell liquors in territory that is prohibited by State law it becomes an accessory before the fact to a crime, so to speak, because it is a crime against the State whenever a person sells liquor contrary to the laws of the State. Therefore, as I see it, the Government is to-day an accessory before the fact in every community in the United States where it issues a license to some one to commit a crime against the laws of a State by selling intoxicating liquors in communities where it is specifically declared by State law that it shall be unlawful to sell them. I do not believe that it is the desire of the legislators of this great nation that our Government shall occupy such an unenviable attitude.

Ah, but you say, gentlemen, why do these people sell it in defiance of law—State law? I say, in answer to that, for the simple reason that they are encouraged to do so by the issuing of a license to them by the Government. It is upon the same principle that a child will become reckless and uncontrollable and absolutely defy the authorities of communities if it is encouraged to do so by a thoughtless parent. The child thinks the parent more powerful and of greater consequence than the rest of the world combined, and so the "blind-tiger" man thinks that when his parent government authorizes him to commit certain acts, no matter how much in violation of the law of the community in which he lives, that he is measurably justified in so violating the local laws. He feels that the power behind him is greater than that against him, and hence he shuts his eyes to local laws and local influences and becomes a "blind tiger" in defiance of local authorities.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. MACON. With pleasure.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman from Arkansas have the special tax on liquor sellers repealed?

Mr. MACON. No, sir; I would not.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman would continue the license, then?

Mr. MACON. I would not continue it in prohibited territory, where States and Territories prohibited the sale of it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. But suppose some day the local option should terminate by the action of the people in that locality.

Mr. MACON. Then the Government would be at liberty, under the law, to issue a license the very next hour.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Does not the gentleman use the wrong word when he speaks of a "license?"

Mr. MACON. I understand that anything that gives a person the privilege to sell liquor is a license to do so.

Mr. GROSVENOR. But does it give a person the privilege to do anything of the kind? It simply taxes him if he does sell it, but it gives him no authority.

Mr. MACON. In our State we call it a license.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I know, but the courts have said that it did not authorize him to sell in violation of law. The gentleman having been a law officer knows that there is no immunity for doing a thing under a license if the government that issues the license is incompetent to do so, and that the liquor seller is not thereby protected by the payment of the special tax imposed upon him by the government in any locality where he is forbidden by law to sell.

Mr. MACON. Not from the penalties of the State law.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And the United States statute expressly provides that the certificate of the fact that he has paid his tax shall not be a license to sell. The receipt itself so reads, and he is notified when he pays his tax that it is not a license and gives him no authority anywhere.

Mr. MACON. Will the gentleman from Ohio say that the courts of the United States will interfere with his selling it in prohibited territory after it has furnished him with a certificate?

Mr. GROSVENOR. They will not interfere with it, nor will they protect it.

Mr. MACON. But does not the Government say to him in terms, "We will be hands off; we hand you this certificate for so much; we are hands off; now go and sell when and where you please?"

Mr. GROSVENOR. Wherever the Government of the United States has jurisdiction it will punish a man. It will punish him in this city and it will punish him in the Territories, and it will punish him anywhere in the United States if he sells without paying the license.

Mr. MACON. That is exactly what I am trying to get this Congress to do—to provide by law that no license shall be issued to anyone to sell liquors in prohibited territory, so that when they do sell the Government will prosecute them for so doing.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Or tax.

Mr. MACON. Well, call it tax, if you please.

Mr. GROSVENOR. He commits one crime by selling without having paid the tax.

Mr. MACON. Yes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. He commits another crime against another jurisdiction if he violates the law of a State, and he can, therefore, as it has been held over and over again, be twice tried for a single act. That is one of the anomalies of our criminal statutes.

Mr. MACON. I understand that, and that is just what I have introduced this bill for—to stop that sort of anomaly.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am not complaining of the bill. I am complaining only of the gentleman's charging that this great Government is licensing a man to sell liquor.

Mr. MACON. I will take that back, if it would please the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It would please me very much.

Mr. MACON. And say that it is allowing him, by reason of the fact that he pays a tax to it, to go into prohibited territory and violate State and Territorial laws with the distinct understanding that he will not be interfered with on the part of the Government, no matter how vicious and debauching his business becomes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The Government does not allow him to sell, and the Government notifies him that it is not an allowance to sell. When he pays the money for taxation, the Government says to the man: "This shall not be an authority to you to violate the local statute of a State or city or town." It says so in distinct terms, just exactly as when the government of Arkansas puts a tax on your horse it still allows you to run that horse in a race, and you may violate the law of Arkansas by betting on that horse, but it gives you a receipt for the tax that you have paid on your horse. The State of Arkansas taxes your house, but it does not allow you to keep a gambling institution in that house. That is the distinction I am trying to draw, that the government that taxes property or an occupation by no means licenses or countenances or authorizes the continuation or doing of an act in violation of a local statute of the State or municipality, nor yet of the United States Government.

Mr. MACON. In response to what the distinguished gentleman from Ohio has said, I will say that whenever the strong arm of this Government issues to anyone a certificate saying that it will not interfere with his transactions when he violates a State or Territorial law in the business that he is engaged in, such as the selling of liquor, then and there it puts an instrument in his hands to do a thing that is in violation of local law. In other words, I contend most earnestly that such a proceeding is an inducement to him to engage in an illegitimate business. He feels that the Government of the United States is behind him, to the extent at least that he has its sanction to engage in the business and an assurance from it that it will keep the hands of its officers off of him.

Mr. GROSVENOR. But the Government has notified the taker of that certificate that it will not protect him.

Mr. MACON. I think I will be able to satisfy the gentleman in my argument before I get through. I recognize the fact that the Government does not notify him that it will protect him against the State law, but it says, "You have my permission to sell in defiance of State law."

Mr. GROSVENOR. It does not say anything of the kind, if the gentleman will allow me. It utters no word to him except that he has paid the money and that the payment of the money is not a protection to him against the violation of law.

Mr. MACON. That is a quibble upon words.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It is the receipt for the tax.

Mr. MACON. I insist that it is a quibble upon words, pure and simple.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Is a receipt for the tax on your revolver, if you have one, an encouragement to you to go and shoot somebody with that revolver?

Mr. MACON. If the Government, for the payment of a tax, were to give me a certificate or receipt for the money that justified me in its estimation in going and killing people with my revolver, I say to you that, as an ordinary man, I would be much more likely to kill people than I would if I had no authorization from so great an institution to commit such diabolic offenses. Anything that is sanctioned or condoned by a strong power like our Government is an inducement to ordinary mortals to do that which they would not otherwise think of doing.

If the Government of the United States had a law saying that unless I paid a special tax I could not carry a pistol, and I was more afraid of the courts of the United States than I was of the local courts, I would, when the tax was paid and the certificate authorizing me to carry it given, be stimulated to a degree to put the pistol in my pocket and take my chances with the local courts. Upon the same principle, when the Government of the United States says to its citizens, "If you will pay a certain amount of money the Government will allow you, so far as it is concerned, to engage in the 'blind-tiger' traffic in violation of local law," it is necessarily an encouragement to them in their nefarious and illicit practice. Again, gentlemen of the House know that every man who violates law in this country would rather violate the local than the national law, especially where there is a punishment fixed for the violation of the law, he not being a corporation prince or a trust king.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman allow me a moment? As I understand his proposition, the officer whose duty it is to collect the tax may refuse to give the certificate.

Mr. MACON. Yes, sir. I not only want him to refuse to give the certificate, but I want him to be denied the right to give it to anyone and collect money therefor, call it tax money or what you will, in prohibited territory.

Mr. GROSVENOR. But if the man goes into that kind of territory and sells in violation of the United States statute, then he may be punished for it.

Mr. MACON. Of course he will be punished for it by the United States courts, if the Government officials have not granted him the right by reason of the collection of a tax to go into it and violate the law. I hope the gentleman will allow me to finish my argument, and if when I have completed it there is anything I have left out that he wants to know about the bill I will thank him for calling my attention to it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It is not what you "left out" that I am complaining of, but what you put in.

Mr. MACON. Well, I want to "put in" a little more. [Laughter.] The gentleman has interfered with the thread of my argument to the extent that I have not been able to connect the links so as to make a complete chain. The gentleman from Ohio has taken up so much of my time that I will have to ask the House to be patient with me.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MACON. I understood I was to have thirty minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has occupied thirty minutes.

Mr. MACON. I have been interrupted so much that I have not had the opportunity to make the speech I would have liked to make upon this subject, and I would be glad to have a little more time. I want the gentlemen of the House to hear every phase of this question, as I believe it is one of great moment and ought to appeal to every head and heart in the United States.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I yield the gentleman ten minutes more.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to abuse the men that engage in the "blind-tiger" business or to accuse them all of being bad at heart. I have known some of them who would travel through sunshine or shadow, through fair weather or through storm, in order to do a good deed; but for some unknowable reason some men will engage in that kind of business. Usually they are what are termed "good fellows," and are ready to divide their last piece of bread with the foot-sore wayfarer. Hence there is always some one, and justly so, to say a kind word for them as individuals, no matter how much they decry their business.

Always having adherents in the communities in which they live, they feel that if they can get the sanction of their National Government to engage in the illicit sale of liquor they will take chances as against the local law. They know that they are to be tried by men of their immediate locality, and they think that when they face the jury they will see some one on it, perhaps, for whom they have performed some personal service and who they believe will give them the benefit of any sort of doubt, and it is a fact that in many cases, just because the accused is a "good fellow," some one will be found on a local jury who will hang it or force an acquittal. Or, suppose he is convicted. The offender and his friends can go to the governor and appeal to him in a pathetic way with great hope of success in getting him a pardon. These same men know very well that when they are tried under the laws of the United States the marshal is not elected by them and is under no obligation to them; they know that they are tried by persons who come from all over a large district and who are not in personal sympathy with them or their local conditions—for whom they have performed no service of any kind or character, and therefore have no reasons to look to them for any sort of favor. They also know that when convicted they have to go a long, long way to reach the President's ear, and they know, further, that his time is so employed by great questions of state that he can not afford to pay any attention to those who knock at the White House door seeking pardons for having violated the revenue laws of the country. The knowledge of such facts deters them from engaging in the "blind-tiger" business. In other words, they are afraid of the United States courts. Under the present practice of the Government these parties often defeat justice, even in the United States courts, and laugh about it after it is done.

For instance, they buy a license, or pay a tax, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] would have it called, for three months, and they sell the year round under that special privilege. When a witness is brought before the grand jury and informs upon them and the party that he appears against is indicted and brought to trial, the witness is put upon the stand, and during the course of the examination he is asked to specifically name the time that he bought intoxicating liquors from the accused. He may reply that he bought it in July, but is not positive as to the time. Then he will be pressed to know if the purchase might not have been made in April, May, or June, or some other time than the month of July. He usually has some doubt about whether it was in July, as he thought, or at some other time, and in that condition he is dismissed. The accused is then put upon the stand, and he says that he remembers well that he sold the liquor to the prosecuting witness at a specific time, being sure to name a time that is covered by his tax receipt, as the gentleman from Ohio would call it, and he then exhibits his receipt, showing that he has paid the revenue for the quarter beginning with April and ending with June. That leaves the matter in such condition as that the court would not allow a conviction to stand in his case. Hence the prosecution has been a farce, and the accused can well afford to go out and laugh.

Mr. Chairman, I assert with all the seriousness of my nature that the enforcement of the local-option laws of this country is a mere farce and will be so long as the Government issues a tax receipt, certificate, license, or anything else the gentleman from Ohio cares to call it, that clothes them with immunity from the Federal courts, no matter how flagrantly they may violate the local-option laws of the various States and Territories. Pass the kind of law that I now propose and "blind tigers" will take to the woods. They will "hunt tall timber," as the old saying is, and the social conditions of every community in this fair land will be cleared up and made manifestly better by reason thereof. The "blind-tiger" man does no good for himself, for if he persists in his business he usually reaches an untimely grave and leaves a homeless and poverty-stricken family behind him. He poisons the social atmosphere of every community in which he exists. He debauches manhood and makes perjurers of some of our best young men, young men who, if left free from such baneful influences, would adorn society and fill the high places of our country. He causes salty tears to trickle down the wrinkled cheeks of devoted old mothers. He sticks daggers into the hearts of loving wives and sisters. He causes children to shiver with cold and to suffer with the pangs of hunger. He brings sorrow, but no joy. He makes criminals, but no Christians. He can not thrive in any community where the States or Territories authorize by license the sale of liquors, and he can not thrive in prohibited territory if the Government will take from him the authority that it gives him to invade the sanctity of those communities and to violate the sacredness of local laws. He is an enemy to himself, his family, and his country, and hence there is no reason that I can conceive of for his existence upon the face of the earth.

I am not talking against the individual, but I want to do and say everything I can against his illegitimate business. This is not a Democratic or a Republican question. It is one that concerns every man alike, whether he be white, black, red, or of other complexion. It concerns every mother, wife, sister, and babe in the broad land, and no one will have the temerity to say that if enacted into law it will not be beneficial to every community within these United States. The only argument that I have heard against the passage of the bill is that it will cut off a portion of our revenue. Gentlemen, you have heard of the cry of blood money all your lives. In my judgment no money was ever stained with redder blood than that which comes to the Treasury of the United States through the "blind-tiger" channel. Every dollar of it is dyed with the red blood that is wrung from the hearts of the women and children of this country, and no matter how deep they may sink it in the "till," the stain will not be removed, and it can not escape the sound of the heart-rending wails that inveigh against it.

I have taken up too much of your time in talking about this matter, I know, and yet I have not said half that I would like to say upon the subject. I ask you to investigate every phase of the question; to sound the communities in which you live and see whether or not it is the wish of your people to have the United States Government grant a privilege to persons to sell liquors in the various communities contrary to the laws of the State or Territory in which they are situated. If you find that the bill is in the interest of humanity; if you believe it is to the interest of social conditions and happy homes, I beseech you to pass it, and all the people who live in communities where the blind-tiger pest now abides will rise up and call you blessed. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the request is granted.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, the time so far taken has been about equally divided. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] used ten minutes more time than has been used on this side. I am going to ask that the committee rise temporarily, so that I may obtain unanimous consent for an extension of time. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. GROSVENOR having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. LACEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the urgent deficiency bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS] be given time in which to address the Committee of the Whole, and that the amount of time occupied by him be granted to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON], to distribute as he desires, after the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS] has concluded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that an extension of time be given to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS] to address the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union on the pending bill, and that an equal amount of time be given to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON], to be disposed of as he may see fit. Is there objection?

Mr. HEMENWAY. And I will ask to add to that the request that upon the conclusion of that time the general debate shall close.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. And that at the conclusion of that length of time the general debate upon the measure shall be closed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the urgent deficiency bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. LACEY in the chair.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. GROSVENOR having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. BARNES, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved bills and joint resolutions of the following titles:

S. 465. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to permit the Pintsch Compressing Company to lay pipes in certain streets in the city of Washington," approved May 19, 1896.

January 27, 1904:

S. R. 32. Joint resolution to fill vacancies in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Mr. Chairman, I have been very much interested in the line that this debate has taken, political in its character. Beyond everything else we are a political people. The very nature of our institutions makes us such. Political parties in their birth were coincident with the birth of our Constitution, and since that instrument was adopted we have always had two great political parties in this country. I sincerely trust that the time may never come when there will not be two great political parties, the one to keep watch on the other; but if ever there was a time that it seemed as though there were really but one political party, that time is the present.

Back on the Wabash, where I live, there was a farmer who employed at one time an Irishman fresh from across the water. The farmer had come in possession of a water turtle, and he asked Pat the next morning after he arrived to go out in the barn lot and kill the water turtle. I do not know whether all Members of this body are acquainted with the habits, manners, and customs of that creature or not; but it possesses the peculiar ability to walk about after its head is cut off. Pat went out and cut off the head of the turtle. The farmer in the course of a few hours saw the turtle walking around in the barn lot. He said to Pat, "I thought I told you to kill that turtle?" "Yes," said Pat, "you did, and I killed the turtle, and the turtle is dead, but it does not realize it." [Laughter.] I take it that this is the position of the Democratic party largely to-day. It is dead, but it does not realize its condition. But it will realize its condition unless some method be adopted by which the "peerless leader" from Nebraska can be muzzled and taken off the public platform.

Mr. Chairman, if there is any one political proposition that has been established beyond another in this country in the last ten years, it is that the hope of power and the failure to possess power are absolutely essential to cohesion in the Democratic party. Success at the polls is absolutely fatal to the Democratic party. Those were splendid legions that followed Tilden in 1876; those were splendid legions that followed Hancock in 1880; and those that followed Cleveland in 1884, 1888, and 1892. Where are they now? The success of 1892 scattered them——

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Getting together.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS (continuing). And to-day the Democratic party finds itself in the midst of demoralization and humiliation, without a leader and without a man. I was very much impressed by a statement made a short time ago by Mr. William C. Whitney, a well-known Democrat, who lives in New York. He said that at the present time the Democratic party was absolutely without a measure and without a man. By that he did not mean that there were not in the various elements that make up the Democratic party able men; what he did mean was that there was no man who could stand for all the fads and isms represented by the various factions of the Democratic party.

On the other hand, the Republican party is rich in men and it is rich in measures. The Republican party has always been rich in men and it has always been rich in measures.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Got any money?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. We always have money under a Republican Administration, even down in the distinguished gentleman's State. [Applause on the Republican side.] And, speaking of men, Mr. Chairman, recalls the fact that there have been great changes in this body since some of us came here in the Fifty-fifth Congress.

We recall the days of that Congress with pride not unmixed with sorrow and can never revert to them with other than feelings of reverence. The four men most conspicuous in our party and most potential in the affairs of government at that time now belong to the ages. William McKinley, our President; Garret A. Hobart, our Vice-President; Thomas B. Reed, our Speaker; Nelson Dingley, our leader. I doubt if four men ever contemporaneously served this Republic who were better fitted to perform their parts than were these four men. They had a great work before them. They were to lead in the work of the restoration of business, which meant the prosperity, the comfort, and the happiness of 70,000,000 people.

How well they performed their work the world knows, and when we laid them away not the slightest stain tarnished the shield of any one of them. McKinley, Hobart, Reed, and Dingley! Certainly even our political opponents ought to concede some virtue to a party which in a few brief months can give to immortality such a quartet as that and still stand with its face to the future more hopeful, more ambitious, more courageous, more nearly invincible than ever before. [Applause.]

What a tribute to the reserve strength of the Republican party! Our leaders go and others step forward to take their places. It has been thus since the days of Abraham Lincoln, and is true because the principles for which these men have stood have been grounded in truth and political righteousness.

A gentleman who addressed this House a few days ago stated that he could never understand why the people of this country had turned their backs on the Harrison Administration in 1892 and gone over to the Democratic party and changed the policies of the Government. The gentleman's memory must be exceedingly short, for were he to go back and call up the incidents of that campaign it would all seem perfectly plain to him.

Benjamin Harrison and his Administration from 1888 to 1892! Up to that time there was nothing like it in the history of the American Republic; there was more wealth in more homes in 1892 than there had ever been before; there were more people owning their own homes that ever before. Wages were higher then than ever before; there were more young men and young women going away to college from the country, from the small towns, and from the cities than ever before; more carpets were on more floors and more pictures were on more walls and more pianos were in more parlors than there had ever been at any time in any country since the stars sang together on the morning of the creation.

But for some unaccountable reason a majority of the American people went to the polls and voted the Democratic ticket. Why did they do it? It was because they were deceived and misled; they did it, Mr. Chairman, because our friends on the other side who led in that campaign falsified and took the people away from the truth. I remember distinctly——

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Is it not true, my dear sir, that every Presidential election has been decided in the last twelve years by what is called the "independent" or "floating" vote in this country? Is that not true? Is it not true of Indiana? Is it not true of Illinois? Is it not true of New York State and many other States that the independent or "floating" vote controls the State?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. The independent vote controls the election in all the States north of Mason and Dixon's line, but I want to say to the distinguished gentleman it does not control any votes on the other side of Mason and Dixon's line.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Do you make any distinction between that independent vote and the regular Republican vote?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Why, there is some distinction; yes.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. You are asking the question why Mr. Harrison was defeated and why Mr. Cleveland got an overwhelming majority and why Mr. McKinley got an overwhelming majority.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Yes.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Was it not from this floating or independent vote?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. It was from the independent vote which the Democratic leaders misled.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. And it is the independent vote you sometimes lose that would beat you.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. That is true, but I want to say to the gentleman that the independent vote does not come from his section of the country.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I understand; and it will never come from there, as we have no such vote there.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. We will never get it from there until we have a minority representation on election boards.

Mr. BOWIE. You have got them.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. You appoint them.

Mr. BOWIE. No, sir.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I would rather have a Democrat on an election board than a Republican appointed by a Democrat. [Applause on the Republican side.] Right in line with that——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Let me ask the gentleman, Have you election boards in Indiana?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. There is no election board in the State of Indiana upon which there is not a minority representation, and upon which the Democratic party does not name the Democratic member.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Who appoints them?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. They are selected by the chairmen of the two leading political parties.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes; but what officer appoints them?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. The clerk.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The clerk is either a Democrat or a Republican?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. They are appointed the same way down South, and any statement that is made that in Mississippi, at any rate, the minority representative is not always upon a board of that sort, is a very erroneous statement.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Now, as to the State of Georgia——

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS I want to say to the gentleman from Mississippi that that wasn't done in the South before the colored vote was disfranchised.

Mr. BOWIE. In Alabama, at the last election, the Republicans had an even division; the election board was their own selection. That is now a part of the law of the State of Alabama.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. That was after the amendment to the Constitution was passed. I was much impressed by an interview with a gentleman from Tennessee, published in one of the local papers a short time ago. He had been up in New York. He returned to Washington and was interviewed by a local reporter as to the political outlook generally. He said he was not prepared to speak for New England or any Northern State, but as far as Tennessee was concerned it did not matter who was nominated or upon what sort of a platform he stood, Tennessee would give the Democratic party a majority of 30,000. [Laughter on the Republican side.] He might as well have said 100,000.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman yield for an interruption?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. For a question.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. As the gentleman from Indiana is evidently not acquainted with the Southern election boards, I wish to remind him that in North Carolina, which we think is a fairly Democratic State, the election boards are composed of members of both parties and that the Republican members of these boards are appointed under the law upon the recommendation of Republican organizations.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. That is since the adoption of the grandfather clause.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. No, sir; we have had a law similar to that for years and years, and for many years in our State a majority of the election officers were hostile to the Democratic party, and under such circumstances as these, when the majority of the election officers were against us, we have elected our candidate by overwhelming majorities. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I served as a member of an election committee, and I saw samples of the fair elections in South Carolina, and the gentleman from North Carolina can not change my impression. Those elections were conducted by Democrats clad in red shirts and armed with shotguns.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I want to say to the gentleman that the boards are selected by the chairmen of the two different parties in Texas exactly as has been explained by the gentleman from North Carolina. The Republican party has a fair representation upon that board selected by their own chairman of that State, and I believe Texas is a Democratic State.

Mr. FINLEY rose.

Mr. SCUDDER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Oh, I can not yield to all; my time is going very rapidly. There is not time for all the States.

Mr. CURRIER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Indiana will allow me, I want to say that in an election case just heard before the House committee it appeared that in one Southern State the Republican judges that were appointed were men that could not read or write.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. In very many of the places there are no Republicans that can read or write. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] Would you have them cut them out entirely?

Mr. PAYNE. Why don't you let them in under the grandfather clause? [Laughter.]

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman from Mississippi that if my memory serves me right, there were only about eleven hundred and some odd votes in his district altogether at the last election.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Does the gentleman mean in my district?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Yes; in the gentleman's district.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Why, there wasn't any Republican vote. [Laughter.] There wasn't any opposition to me. There was no nomination by the other party.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Why?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Because no one was idiot enough to imagine that he could be elected in that most intelligent district of the United States of America, where nobody can vote unless he can read and write the English language. [Great laughter.]

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. It would seem, then, from the returns that there were only about 1,400 who could read and write the English language. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. There the gentleman is mistaken, as usual, for the old familiar Republican reason, that half knowledge is so much worse than no knowledge at all. I ran through a very exciting Democratic primary election just prior to that general election, and if the gentleman would look at the primary returns he would find the vote was a very large one, considering that the voters are restricted to men who can read and write, and that 62 per cent of the population are negroes, and of that negro population 58 per cent can not read and write; and the balance would rather bribe themselves with $3 a piece not to vote than to vote, coupled with the condition of paying a $3 tax.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Who bribes them?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Why, they bribe themselves. [Laughter.] I will tell you how.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I will say to the gentleman from Mississippi that I have heard of a man who robbed his own trunk, but I have never heard of a man who bribed himself. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Well, this is a most remarkable statement, and yet a plain story will enable a gentleman of the intelligence of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS] to comprehend it perfectly. The white people of the State of Mississippi, understanding race traits and tendencies, put upon the statute books a poll tax and said that before anybody could vote he must have paid that poll tax the February previous to the election.

Then we went a step further and provided no machinery to collect that tax except from taxable property. I can be made to pay it, but a poor nigger without taxable property or a white man without it can not be made to pay it. The sheriff can not go and arrest him; he can not take any steps to collect the tax, and the only penalty is that if a man does not pay it he can not vote, and Mr. Sambo prefers to bribe himself not to vote. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. And the result in Mississippi is just exactly as it has always been—there was no difference before these new qualifications were established.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Oh, yes; there was.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. You selected a solid delegation then by a no larger vote than you cast now.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Oh, yes; we cast a very much larger vote, and had very exciting elections—sometimes far beyond in excitement any that the gentleman and his colleagues hold up in his country. Sometimes we went to the point of bloodshed.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. At the primaries?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. No; at the general elections; and up to the time of the adoption of the constitution we had Republican nominees, and I will say further that I have run against two Populists in my time as Populist nominees for Congress, and in those cases the full vote was brought out.

Mr. PAYNE. I will state that Mr. Allen—John Allen; we all remember him—used to explain how they did in those days. He said that early in the morning they used to fire a gun so the niggers might know there was going to be an election—simply to call their attention to it. [Laughter.]

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like very much to submit——

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like my friend to permit me to offer him a suggestion by saying that we are at this time suffering from the absence of the gentleman from Texas, who has had to go home in order to pay his poll tax in order to vote at the next election.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. That shows what a good citizen he is. He would not surrender the sacred function of citizenship.

Mr. MARTIN. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I will yield this one time, but no more.

Mr. MARTIN. I should like, in the interest of information, in the time of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS] to ask the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] how many qualified voters there are in his district?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I do not know how many there are in the district which I now represent. In the Fifth district, which I represented before I was thrown into this new one, there were some 20,000. In this one I have not had them counted as yet.

Mr. MARTIN. The Eighth is the district of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. That is the district I represent. The Fifth was the district I represented before I was elected this last time, and I have not the figures of the number of qualified voters in the present district.

Mr. MARTIN. I see the gentleman is now from the Eighth district.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN. I would ask the gentleman what his best judgment is as to the number of qualified voters in his district?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. In this district, which is mostly composed of black counties, I do not think that there are over 10,000 qualified electors.

Mr. MARTIN. I notice the number of votes cast in the election in the district represented by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] at the last election, as given in his biographical sketch, is 1,433.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. And so careless were we about it that I will say that the gentleman from Mississippi did not even go to the polls and vote for himself. There was no opposition.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I understand arrangements are now being made to so amend your constitution as to elect you for four years. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Oh, no.

Mr. PAYNE. Was the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] saving his $3—is that the reason he did not go to vote? [Prolonged laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. "The gentleman" could not save his $3, because he had taxable property in the State, and the tax could have been made out of that property. It is only the poor man, without taxable property, who can save his $3. And the poll tax goes to the support of the public schools—over half of it to the education of the negroes.

Mr. PAYNE. And only the poor man who can not raise the $3 can be successfully deprived of his vote.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Mr. Chairman, a short time ago I had occasion to look over the election returns from Mississippi, and I discovered that the eight Members from that State received about 18,000 votes. That is not half the number of Republican voters there were in my district at the last election. In other words, in Mississippi you elect your entire delegation——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. My friend from Indiana wants to be fair, of course.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Always.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I know that, because I know him well enough to know that, as "Uncle Joe Cannon" once said, "He is as fair as political exigencies admit of." [Laughter.]

Now, then, suppose in your district, and in all the other districts of the State of Indiana, there were no Democratic nominees running against any of the Republican candidates for Congress; and suppose that had been going on for three terms——

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. That is a supposition contrary to reality.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Suppose it, however; we can suppose anything.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. In Mississippi! [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Especially men with so brilliant an imagination in regard to facts as that possessed by my friend from Indiana. [Laughter.]

Now, suppose that to have been the case; how many voters do you think would have turned out in your Congressional district to vote for you as a perfunctory act when they had already nominated you?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. That is absolutely an unsupposable case in my district.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Suppose, furthermore, that the law provided, as I doubt not it does in your State, that the names of the persons to be voted for must be upon the ticket two weeks, or some other specified time, before the election; and suppose that the period of two weeks before the election had arrived and partly expired and no other nominations had been made, that the name of nobody else had been put upon the ticket, even by petition, and nobody else could possibly be voted for under the law. How many voters does the gentleman suppose would have turned out and voted for him when there was no possibility whatever of his being defeated?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. That is not a supposable case.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. May I be allowed to answer the suggestion of the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I must insist that my time shall not be all occupied by other gentlemen.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I will say to the gentleman from Mississippi that in my district there was no nomination made by the Democrats, yet 45,000 votes were cast.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Ah, but in Philadelphia they vote by machinery. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. No; we do not——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. You have a labor-saving device.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. We do not have to disfranchise people to whom the Constitution of the United States has granted the ballot in order to elect our candidates.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Nor do we; nor have we ever done so, and anybody who says that we have undertakes to be a better lawyer than the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I know what the Constitution says——

The CHAIRMAN. Has the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS] yielded the floor to anyone; and if so, will he kindly indicate to whom?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I must decline to yield further to anybody.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana declines to yield further.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I want to remind the gentleman from Indiana that his time is unlimited.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana declines to yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I want to bring the gentleman nearer home—to some matters concerning the fairness of elections which I am sure he desires to hear.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I must decline to yield for the present.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. In the matter of redistricting——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana declines to yield.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. In response to the gentleman from Mississippi, who said that in Philadelphia they vote by machinery, I would suggest that it does not seem to be as effective in Philadelphia as voting by the shotgun down in Mississippi. [Derisive cries on the Democratic side.]

And in this connection I want to call attention to the fact that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] had no contestant in the recent election, yet there were cast for him 19,000 votes. General BINGHAM had no contestant against him, and there were cast for him 32,000 votes. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Were there not other officers voted for at the same election?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana declines to yield. The gentleman from Mississippi is not in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Just one more question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has declined to yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman has not declined to yield. I am asking him now.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I must decline to yield, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. You did have a gubernatorial election. Why don't you admit it?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. There were other officers voted for at the same time, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I regret, Mr. Chairman, that this discussion has been drawn into this particular line. [Laughter.] I had intended simply addressing myself to the reason why the people of this country abandoned Republicanism in 1892, and went over to Democracy. That was my intention at the time I was interrupted. The reason why the people of this country did so in 1892 was because they were misled, because they were deceived.

You remember how political orators went through the country in that campaign and succeeded in impressing upon the people as a fact the fiction that they were being robbed; that they were being oppressed by the mill bosses and the factory lords, and that the heel of the plutocrat was upon their necks; that the rich were growing richer and the poor were growing poorer. I remember hearing a prominent Member of this House who spoke in Indiana in that campaign going over a rigmarole that was very popular in 1892.

He would pick out some poorly dressed man in the audience and say to him: "John, do you know that you are being robbed? Do you know that you are being victimized by the mill bosses and factory lords? Do you know that you are taxed from the day you are born until the hour you die?"

"Why," he would say, "John, you arise in the morning by turning down a coverlid that is taxed 60 per cent. You put your feet out on a carpet that is taxed 90 per cent. You put on a hat that is taxed 100 per cent. You put on a pair of pantaloons that is taxed 300 per cent; a pair of suspenders that is taxed 40 per cent. You lift a latch on the door that is taxed 80 per cent; wash your face in a basin that is taxed 90 per cent, and then go in and sit down at the breakfast table and eat your poor, God-forsaken breakfast with a knife and fork taxed 666⅔ per cent."

He would repeat that until that man would think, after he had heard it all, that it would cost him from $150 to $200 to get ready for breakfast every morning. [Laughter.]

Hired peddlers were sent out by the national Democratic committee, who went through Indiana offering tin cups for sale at a dollar apiece, and every time the housewife would shake her head and marvel at the price, the hired peddler would shake his head and say, "Well, it is high, but it is all on account of the infamous McKinley bill." And in some parts of Indiana they sent men through the country peddling gourd seed, offering it for nothing, and saying to the farmer, "They have robbed you of your tin cup and your tin pail, but thank God they can not take from you the gourds of your fathers." [Laughter.]

That is the way you did it in 1892, and you won. Grover Cleveland was elected. You secured control of both branches of this Government, and I contend that that was the greatest mistake the Democratic party ever made. They found themselves facing the people of this country in the midst of a domestic prosperity never before equalled. They were pledged to improve it. Capital was employed; they promised to employ it better. Wages were high; they promised to make them higher. Labor! There was not an idle man in the United States of America unless he was idle from choice; and you are acquainted with the result. Scarce three months passed until the idle men commenced roaming over the country.

Bankruptcy became an epidemic. Idleness got to be a profession, and hard-times festivals became popular social functions. You did that, gentlemen. You brought about that condition of affairs—you prophets, you promisers, you arraigners. You packed the side tracks of the railroads of this country with empty cars. You sent the price of corn so low it was burned as fuel. The farmer fed 30-cent wheat to 2-cent hogs, and horses were not worth wintering, and sheep shivered and died on the range because they were not worth sheltering, and as many as 100 idle men were found on single trains roaming this country in search of work.

At the end of four years everybody in the United States admitted that everything was wrong and that it was simply a question as to the best policy to bring us back where we were when Benjamin Harrison was President of the United States. Our friends on the other side said that the panacea was free silver. They said we did not have enough money with which to carry on the business of the country. We must have had very little money, because we did not have any business. They said that the only way to get more money was to have free silver; that the only way to get good times was through the ratio of 16 to 1.

The Republican party said, "The money is all right. We have enough money. The trouble is with this policy of tariff for revenue only, or free trade. If we can elect a President and a Congress that will kill the free-trade Wilson bill and reenthrone the policy of protection, prosperity will return."

The two parties went before the country, one headed by Mr. Bryan and the other by Mr. McKinley. In November the verdict was rendered, and by an overwhelming majority the people of this country declared in favor of sound money and a protective tariff, and elected William McKinley President of the United States.

I say is there anybody in the sound of my voice who voted for William McKinley that has ever regretted it?

> If such there be, go mark him well;
> For him no minstrel rapture will ever swell.

And you knew that times would get better. You gentlemen on the other side of the aisle expected it. I remember walking down the street of the little town in which I live the second morning after the election, and a well-known Democrat said to me, "You have elected your President." I said, "Yes." "You have secured control of both branches of Congress." "Yes." "Well," said he, "where is your prosperity?" [Laughter.]

They expected us to set the national hen in the evening and serve the Democrats with fried chicken out of the same nest the very next morning. [Laughter.] A special session of Congress was called. You remember just as soon as we met they asked us, "Where is your prosperity?" Then the Dingley bill passed the House, and they kept asking us, "Where is your prosperity?" I remember that after the bill went over to the Senate and came back here to receive the approbation of this body they would come up to us and ask, "Have you seen the General?" We would ask, "General who?" And then they would say, "General Prosperity," and then they would laugh; they would laugh until their sides would ache; but it was no trouble for their sides to ache, because their stomachs had been empty for four years. [Laughter.]

Then the bill passed through conference and became a law, and after that bill became law did any Republican ever hear any Democrat in this land who would ask, "Have you seen the General?" The way had been prepared for the General to come, and straightway he came. Avenues for prosperity had opened, and prosperity came. And it did not come solely from New England and Pennsylvania, which have frequently been said to be the sole beneficiaries of a protective tariff.

It came from the South, whose States, from the Carolinas to the broad fields of Texas, have been pouring into the world's commerce an annual contribution worthy of a mighty empire. It came from the far West: from Kansas and Nebraska and their sister States with their black soil; from those States that wear mountains on their bosoms—mountains grim in their ruggedness and haughty in their wealth of hidden ore. It came from California, from Oregon, from Washington. It came from the broad sweep of the Mississippi Valley, whose farms and whose cities, whose soil and whose wealth, and whose people and whose progress are at once the marvel and the hope of American civilization, embodying as they do the spirit, the ambition, and the conservatism that are the surest guaranty of the growth and stability of the Republic.

From everywhere it came, showering its blessings on the children of men. And this prosperity will stay, if Democrats will simply keep their hands off. It would go to pieces to-morrow if there should be absolute evidence that Democratic ascendency were assured within the next twelve months. Business would be blighted, confidence would become a coward, and we would find ourselves where our fathers found themselves under the Administrations of Martin Van Buren and James Buchanan, and where we found ourselves under the last Administration of Grover Cleveland. [Applause.]

But the American people will not repeat the mistake of 1892. The present generation will not soon forget those four years.

The Republican party came into power in 1897. A special session of Congress was called, and the Republican party proceeded to keep its promises and redeem its pledges. The first thing we did was to take a club and kill that free-trade Gorman-Wilson tariff bill. Then the next thing we did was to pass a bankruptcy law—a general bankruptcy law. Such a law is as essential after a Democratic Administration as a hospital corps is with an army that fights battles. [Laughter.]

Then after that we passed a law establishing the gold standard, and while we were doing all these things we were giving attention to Spain. That war was fought, Cuba was freed, Porto Rico was taken, Hawaii annexed, and the Philippine Islands taken care of, and to-day the American people stand and challenge the world on the record that the Republican party has made. We will go into the next campaign and we will fight that battle on this record; and, Mr. Chairman, I am not afraid of the result.

To-day, under the Republican party, the country is still moving forward. Busy men have employment; happiness is in the home. We imported from abroad last year more than a billion dollars' worth—several millions of dollars more than ever before. We sent abroad last year in the neighborhood of $1,400,000,000 worth—millions of dollars more than ever before.

We sold abroad in the neighborhood of $350,000,000 more than we bought abroad. Our domestic trade amounted to $30,000,000,000. We can scarcely find figures in which to express it, but our friends on the other side of the Chamber say they are going to make the next campaign by contrasting the conditions under Mr. Roosevelt's Administration with conditions under Mr. McKinley's Administration.

No; no! We will fight this next campaign on the conditions existing under the McKinley and Roosevelt Administrations as contrasted with the conditions existing under the last Cleveland Administration. [Applause on the Republican side.] You can not get away from it.

I was very much impressed with the speech made by my friend from Illinois yesterday, in which he called attention to the prosperity that marked the South—a great and natural prosperity. It was doubtless astonishing to a number of the Members on the other side of this Chamber——

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Not at all.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Then I can not understand why you continue to vote the Democratic ticket. I have made up my mind that my friend from Georgia can not be surprised by anything——

Mr. LIVINGSTON. It is because those States under Democratic administration are prosperous, and we continue to vote that ticket for that reason.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. That is ridiculous. That country on the other side of Mason and Dixon's line—those States—increased in population, since 1880, 50 per cent and in wealth 200 per cent.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That is native population, not foreign. The increase is native population.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Think of it! In 1880 you produced 6,000,000 tons of bituminous coal. Last year you produced 60,000,000 tons.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The Secretary of Agriculture stated a few days ago, in a public speech, that it was not the Republican party or the Democratic party, but the farmers who had saved the country. What do you say to that?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Well, I will not take issue with the Secretary of Agriculture on that question. One thing I will contend for, and that is that the Democratic party has never saved it, and if the farmers have saved it they have saved it under Republican policies.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Not in the South.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. The prosperity brought about by our policies. Its blessings are visited upon you as well as upon us. In other words, we have saved you from yourselves. You are prosperous in the South in spite of your political bigotry. [Applause on the Republican side.] Another thing, Mr. Chairman, with reference to the South. There has been poured into the South during the last five years for cotton and its products alone $2,652,000,000.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Our cotton crop amounted last year to $700,000,000.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Yes, your cotton and cotton products amounted to $900,000,000.

Eight hundred and seventy-three million dollars more for southern cotton than during the previous five years, that $873,000,000 representing more than the capital of all the national banks in the United States. You consumed during this last year more cotton by a million pounds than all the mills of New England. Six million additional spindles came to you during the last twelve years; only 1,800,000 went to Great Britain, and New England increased only 2,000,000. You had 40 cotton-seed oil mills in 1880. To-day you have 700.

In 1880 you had in the South 20,000 miles of railway. To-day you have 60,000 miles. In 1880 your lumber products amounted to $39,000,000. To-day it is $188,000,000. The total output of pig iron in the South to-day is four times the total output of the United States in 1860. Since 1890 the number of your national banks has increased from 521 to 928, and the deposits have more than doubled—have increased from $126,000,000 to $318,000,000.

Mr. BOWIE. Why not come down, then, and visit us?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Now, Mr. Chairman, these statistics refute the Democratic contention for sixty years past; these statistics are enough to make John C. Calhoun, Bob Toombs, and Jefferson Davis turn over in their caskets. In New Orleans every time there is a meeting of the board of trade it is almost like a Fourth of July celebration—felicitations are passed around. New Orleans has regained her lost prestige under the policies of the Republican party, and Galveston has risen until it is the third export and import city in the United States.

Fifty-three lines of steamships head out from Galveston. I saw the other day there had been 832 industrial establishments located along the Southern Railroad during the last year; 30 cotton mills are in course of construction along the line of that road.

From the Southern Farm Magazine I get the information that during the last ten years 75,000 northern farmers have settled between New Orleans and Corpus Christi.

This southern industrial farming has brought under cultivation 3,000,000 acres of southern farm land. Eight hundred thousand acres of this land are devoted to the cultivation of rice, for which a large area of the South has recently been discovered to be particularly adapted. I received a letter the other day stating that 1,000 home seekers had visited the rice-growing district of Louisiana in a single week.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I want to say to the gentleman that our stocks have all doubled up by the natural increase.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. That natural increase did not characterize that section of the country under the last Cleveland Administration. [Applause.] Your cotton was a drug on the market. North and south, east and west, prosperity has been general, and nowhere has it been as great as in the Southern States. Your railroad bonds during the last year have paid a greater dividend than bonds of any railroads in the United States.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Up to a few years ago the price of cotton was fixed in Liverpool and Wall street. For the last two years we have fixed it in the city of New Orleans, and have got double for our cotton what we ever did before. We intend to make the price hereafter in New Orleans and not in Liverpool or Wall street.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Why didn't you do it under the Democratic Administration? [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. LIVINGSTON. We happened to have but little Democratic Administration; it did not last long. Out of forty-two years you charge us with eight years of Democratic Administration, with four years of Republican Administration in between the eight, and then you undertake to compare that with forty years of Republican hold upon this country, and ask us why we haven't done what you did. My dear man, you know that is an unfair comparison. [Laughter.]

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Now, Mr. Chairman, my friend from Mississippi, in a speech delivered on the floor of the House a short time ago, used these words:

> You will remember that Harrison himself said in a newspaper interview which I read, and have never seen denied, that the reason he was thrown out of power and Cleveland was elected was because of the unprecedented hard times and suffering for which the people of the South and West, without due reason, held his Administration responsible.

Mr. Chairman, I would say that General Harrison, while he was President of the United States, did not make it a business to go on record in newspaper interviews. If he had anything to say he said it in his state papers. And it happens that he spoke to this Congress a short time after the election of 1892, and this is what he said, as contrasted with the words put in his mouth by my friend from Mississippi. I quote from his annual message of December 6, 1892:

> In submitting my annual message to Congress I have great satisfaction in being able to say that the general conditions affecting the commercial and industrial interests of the United States are in the highest degree favorable. A comparison of the existing conditions with those of the most-favored period in the history of the country will, I believe, show that so high a degree of prosperity and so general a diffusion of the comforts of life were never before enjoyed by our people.
> The total wealth of the country in 1860 was $16,159,616,068. In 1890 it amounted to $62,610,000,000 an increase of 287 per cent. * * * There has never been a time in our history when work was so abundant or when wages were as high, whether measured by the currency in which they are paid or by their power to supply the necessaries and comforts of life. It is true that the market prices of cotton and wheat have been low. It is one of the unfavorable incidents of agriculture that the farmer can not produce upon orders. He must sow and reap in ignorance of the aggregate production of the year, and is peculiarly subject to the depreciation which follows overproduction. But while the fact I have stated is true as to the crops mentioned, the general average of prices has been such as give to agriculture a fair participation in the general prosperity. * * *
> I believe that the protective system, which has now for something more than thirty years continuously prevailed in our legislation, has been a mighty instrument for the development of our national wealth and a most powerful agency in protecting the homes of our workingmen from the invasion of want. * * * It is not my purpose to renew here the argument in favor of a protective tariff.
> The result of the recent election must be accepted as having introduced a new policy. We must assume that the present tariff, constructed upon the lines of protection, is to be repealed and that there is to be substituted for it a tariff law constructed solely with reference to revenue; that no duty is to be higher because the increase will keep open an American mill or keep up the wages of an American workman, but that in every case such a rate of duty is to be imposed as will bring to the Treasury of the United States the largest returns of revenue.
> The contention has not been between schedules, but between principles, and it would be offensive to suggest that the prevailing party will not carry into legislation the principles advocated by it and the pledges given to the people. * * * I recommend that the whole subject of tariff revision be left to the incoming Congress. * * * Those who have advocated a protective tariff can well afford to have their disastrous forecasts of a change of policy disappointed.
> If a system of customs duties can be framed that will set the idle wheels and looms of Europe in motion and crowd our warehouses with foreign-made goods and at the same time keep our own mills busy; that will give us an increased participation in the "markets of the world" of greater value than the home market we surrender; that will give increased work to foreign workmen upon products to be consumed by our people without diminishing the amount of work to be done here; that will enable the American manufacturer to pay his workmen from 50 to 100 per cent more in wages than is paid in the foreign mill, and yet to compete in our market and in foreign markets with the foreign producer; that will further reduce the cost of articles of wear and food without reducing the wages of those who produce them; that can be celebrated, after its effects have been realized, as its expectation has been in European as well as in American cities, the authors and promoters of it will be entitled to the highest praise.
> We have had in our history several experiences of the contrasted effects of a revenue and of a protective tariff, but this generation has not felt them, and the experience of one generation is not highly instructive to the next. The friends of the protective system, with undiminished confidence in the principles they have advocated, will await the results of the new experiment.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. What is the date of that message?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. December 6, 1892; that was his last message to Congress.

I want to place that in answer to the words placed in his mouth from a late newspaper interview by my friend from Mississippi. I want to call attention to another thing at this time. In an address delivered before this House a short time ago my friend from Mississippi elucidated from a Southern standpoint the protection proposition, in the course of which he said:

> That brings me, Mr. Chairman, to my favorite banana theory. There is in the United States, I suppose, 100 acres of land where bananas can be grown in the open air, and yet I could, were I the legislating body of this country, or were I the Czar with absolute power and disposed to make the people pay the price for it, create a "great American banana industry." I could put a tax of $1 apiece on bananas which are now selling in the streets three for a nickel, and inside of five years I could, with a good custom-house service, have created and exploited a vast banana industry.
> It is true that a great many people who formerly ate bananas could not buy any bananas at all, and some people would have to buy fewer bananas; but it is also true that a great many people, who are plutocrats and aristocrats, would eat them because the common people—dagoes, Jerseymen, and Mississippians—could not. [Laughter and applause.]
> If I continued that system of taxation in existence for twenty years, at the end of that time there would have come to the front a new generation that "knew not Joseph" nor cheap bananas; and the moment sensible people came into power with the idea of revising the banana schedule these gentlemen who "knew not Joseph" and had gone into the American banana business and perhaps formed a banana trust would come to the committee room of the National Legislature, knocking upon the doors all the time, and giving utterance to cries of unutterable woe:
> "Are you going to strike down the great American banana industry? Are you going to reduce the duty from a dollar apiece on bananas to 80 cents? We can't stand it. It will ruin us. Are you going to make the people engaged in banana raising go to the soup houses? Are you going to discriminate in favor of pauper tropical sunshine against self-respecting American hothouse laborers?" [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Let us stop a moment and follow the banana theory a little further, because I am fond of bananas. [Laughter.] What would have been the result of establishing that industry? Merely this, that you would have deflected a certain amount of American capital and a certain amount of American labor engaged in the general hothouse industry into a different channel of hothouse proceedings, and instead of having their hothouses for the purpose they have them now they would have converted them into banana nurseries, and the consumers would be paying a dollar a piece, or perhaps 90 cents a piece, for bananas, because the protected interest would have to undersell somewhat the foreign markets.

After fifteen or twenty years "home competition" would have reduced the price of bananas in the American market to, let us say, 40 cents apiece, and then Republican orators and politicians would say privately, in newspapers, and on the stump, and within these walls, with due solemnity and without a mutual smile: "Lo, and behold! See how a protective tariff has reduced the price of bananas from 90 cents apiece in 1950 to 40 cents apiece in 1965—nearly 50 per cent decrease in price to the consumer! Protection did it!"

Yes! A reduction from superlative extortion to comparative extortion!

But in all this picture keep in mind one thing: While protectionism lasted bananas would never reach three for a nickel, because if they did, that public enemy—tropical sunshine—would be master.

* * * Now, my friends, I have given you the whole definition and an illustration of the manner of working of the protective tariff wherever it is needed.

I would like to know if that is the sort of protection illustration my friend from Mississippi uses in his biennial campaign. If that is a sample, I do not wonder that there were only eleven hundred and some odd votes cast in his Congressional district at the last election, because I say, if there ever was an unfair illustration, it is the favorite banana theory of the gentleman from Mississippi.

As a matter of fact, the gentleman can not point to a single article manufactured in this country on which there is a protective tariff that is not cheaper to-day than it was the day the protective tariff was placed on the article, and he establishes the reverse by his illustration.

I have here an illustration that I desire to submit in contrast with the gentleman's "favorite banana theory," illustrating, as it does so well, the practical workings of the protective tariff.

In 1883 there were no wire nails produced in this country. They were then selling at $6 a keg. We manufactured that year 50,000 kegs, when a tariff of $4 a keg was placed upon wire nails. In 1884 we manufactured 75,000 kegs, and the price dropped to $5 a keg. In 1885 we manufactured 200,000 kegs, and the price dropped to $4 a keg, which was exactly the tariff duty. In 1886 we manufactured 500,000 kegs, and the price dropped to $3.40 a keg. In 1887 we manufactured 700,000 kegs, and the price dropped to $3.30 a keg. In 1888 we manufactured 2,000,000 kegs, and the price dropped to $2.60 a keg. In 1889 we made over 2,500,000 kegs, and the price dropped to $2.10 a keg. And all this time the duty was $4 per keg. The average price in 1902, the latest available report, was $2.15.

That is the way the Republican policy of protection works. It does not work the banana way. [Applause on the Republican side.] And it has worked this way with reference to steel rails, and with reference to tin, and with reference to every other manufactured article produced in this country upon which there is a protective tariff. [Applause.]

Those within the sound of my voice will remember how, in 1890, when it was proposed to put a tariff on tin plate, some one in this House arose and said that he would take a contract to eat all the tin plate manufactured in this country during the next ten years.

Well, the Democratic stomach is equal to almost anything, but it was not equal to that proposition, because we are manufacturing almost a billion pounds of tin plate in this country every year, and the price of tin plate within three years after the tariff was placed upon it was lower than tin plate had ever been before in the United States. That is the way it works with all these articles. And that is not in harmony with this banana illustration.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Would the gentleman from Indiana mind continuing those figures in regard to wire nails down to the present?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Yes; I will give the gentleman those figures. They will be in my remarks.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Would the gentleman mind reading them now?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Well, I do not care to repeat my speech at this time. Time is short, and I do not feel that I should go over it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I will give the gentleman unlimited time, I will say.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I will give them to the gentleman at the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. BENNY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. No; I would like to very much, but I have not the time now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. And the triumphs that followed in the wake of the restoration of the tariff in the increase of our wealth here at home are paralleled by the triumphs that have followed in every other avenue in which the Republican party has exerted itself since 1897.

The Spanish war came on, and I contend now, Mr. Chairman, that the brightest page that has been written by the Republican party in the last seven years has been written with reference to those questions that followed our war with Spain. That war lasted only ninety days, but the problems that came with it are with us to-day, and they will remain with us until our children are in their graves.

You remember, how after that war came to an end, our friends on the other side of the Chamber insisted that Cuba should immediately be given her freedom and independence. The man in the White House said no, they are not ready. You said, "You have lied to Cuba; you do not intend to give Cuba her independence." We said, "She is not ready for it; we want time to prepare her for her independence."

We brought a carload of school-teachers from Cuba and educated them. We sent scores of Americans down there to teach them the principles of self-government. We went down there and cleaned her cities and towns and put in sewerage systems, and on the 20th of May a year ago Columbia presented Cuba with a pure white parchment of human freedom, and she has been able to take care of that freedom and is happy and independent to-day. Had we done as you wanted us to do, yellow fever would be thriving in Cuba to-day. Revolution would follow revolution, as in Central America, South America, Santo Domingo, and other Spanish-American republics until we would have been involved with other nations of the world.

Not a twelvemonth in the forty years last past when the people of the Southern States have not been anxious almost to the point of hysteria over the threat of the spread of yellow fever, and yet during the last three years there has not been a single case of yellow fever in all Cuba. Why? We remained there long enough to destroy the germs.

Take Porto Rico. Well-informed gentlemen from the island of Porto Rico state that prior to our occupation of that island smallpox had infested parts of it for three hundred years. One of the first things we did when we went there was to take 900,000 people and vaccinate every one of them, and for the last four years there has not been a single case of smallpox in all Porto Rico.

Over in the Philippine Islands when our soldiers went over there it was prophesied that it would take an army of 100,000 men twenty years to establish conditions in those islands so that there would be peace and order and good government.

Those islands have been pacified; law and order have been established, and the army has been reduced to 18,000 men. We have spent vast sums on their docks; we have spent millions on their roads; 15,000 people are working to-day on one road leading up into the mountains from Manila. We have established libraries; we sent a ship loaded with 1,000 school teachers over there to light the torch. Last month 100 Filipino boys came to this country to be educated. They will go back to educate their fellows.

We have started normal schools over there. We have organized trade schools, and we have reorganized their courts in accordance with the dictates of Anglo-Saxon justice. We have given them religious liberty. We have given the farmers of the Philippines primers, translated into their own language, so that they may intelligently cultivate the soil. They have homes now in place of huts over in the Philippine Islands. Those islands are blossoming as a rose. And every dollar expended comes from the revenues of those islands.

Have we done right? If we have not, then civilization is a fraud, enlightenment is a lie, and the Christian church is a whited sepulcher. Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippine Islands in their condition to-day speak volumes for the constructive policy and ability of the Republican party. We have given the nations of the earth new ideas relative to the control of colonial governments.

Where did the Administration of Theodore Roosevelt begin and that of William McKinley end? No one could tell. One merged into the other naturally; the same policy has been carried out under Theodore Roosevelt that was followed under William McKinley. And that is the reason I am for Theodore Roosevelt as our next nominee for President of the United States.

And, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I am not one of those who lay claim to being the original Roosevelt man. Years ago I antagonized Mr. Roosevelt and the theories he then espoused. I accused him in my own newspaper. It came to be a habit with me to say hard things against him. I questioned his honesty. I said in my own newspaper that he was a sham reformer and a pretender. But, Mr. Chairman, I have changed my mind with reference to Theodore Roosevelt.

Mr. FITZGERALD. You have got on the band wagon. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. No, sir; but if I have, I am riding on a wagon that the gentleman's degree of good judgment would not enable him to select a seat in. [Applause on the Republican side.] There is not any such thing as a band wagon in the Democratic party.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is no pie wagon in our party either. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I take that with a good deal of question, noting the avidity with which the gentleman welcomes the candidacy of a distinguished rich man from New York City.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have a candidate for President, and I hope the party will nominate him.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Grover Cleveland?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No, sir; Judge Parker, of New York.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Will the gentleman kindly give me his post-office address? [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman what the first name of his candidate is?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is the gentleman a lawyer?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I trust not. [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. If he were, he would know that Judge Parker is the chief justice of the greatest court, next to the Supreme Court of the United States, in the world. I refer to the court of appeals of the State of New York.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. He is secure in his place, and he had better remain where he is.

No, Mr. Chairman, neither patronage nor selfish policy led me to change my mind with reference to Theodore Roosevelt. He won me, as he won millions of other of his countrymen, by his zeal, by his forcefulness, by his patriotism.

I began to appreciate how I had misjudged him when I saw him, in the face of threatening war, infuse into one of the great departments of this Government, stagnant with the monotonous routine and dry rot of a third of a century, the red blood of activity and timely preparation. I realized what an erroneous estimate I had placed upon him when I saw the announcement that he had decided to resign a place of honor and responsibility and power, which insured conspicuous performance in the very theater of war, to raise a regiment to lead to the front.

It seemed to me this was the supremest test, for it involved goodbye, if not farewell, to little children and their mother. Later I knew how fearfully I had wronged him when, with my colleagues on the floor of this House, I read bulletins which told how he, at the head of his regiment, under a blistering sky, the target for a hundred sharpshooters, had given a modern exhibition of that courage, that daring, that heroic valor which for more than one hundred years had compelled all nations to subscribe to the verdict that the American volunteer soldier is the greatest soldier in the world.

We are told that he mixed up in the Northern Securities affair. Yes; he did. With hundreds of thousands of his countrymen he realized that conservatism had lost its head and that capital had gone mad. He invoked the law passed by this Congress and he called a stop on combination and speculation that was running wild in the Republic. That law was passed by this Congress at the earnest solicitation of the American people.

One of the richest men in New York told me that the country would never know what a service Theodore Roosevelt had rendered when he started the machinery of that litigation. He stated that had matters been permitted to go on unchecked we would have had a panic that would have been without parallel in the history of American financial devastation. The men who are criticising him most severely now are those whom he saved from the consequences of their own rapacious folly.

We are told that he injected himself into the anthracite coal strike. He did. And who is there who will say that he erred?

Mr. BAKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. No, sir.

Mr. BAKER. Has he taken any steps to prosecute——

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield further. As I was saying when interrupted, in that anthracite coal strike the President saw passion and greed facing each other, hostile and uncompromising, and he said to them: "Come, let us reason together." He brought about a settlement of that strike, and he did it without sacrificing, in any manner, the dignity of his office.

We must not forget the situation as it existed then. Millions of people were without fuel. Disease was claiming its victims and the chill of death was in many a cottage. Right here in the city of Washington people were burning their furniture to keep warm. This Capitol building was running on twenty-four hours of coal rations, and we knew not at what hour we would have to suspend business. Men who were known as conservative citizens all over the Union were heading delegations which would stop trains loaded with coal and confiscate the cargo.

Do you not think it was time for some one to speak? A coward in the White House would have remained silent. But there was a brave man in the White House, and he acted, and that strike was settled, and the nation was saved from a series of riots that might have ripened into a revolution. His conduct in the Northern Securities case and in the anthracite coal situation elevated him in the confidence and esteem of the American people, and his course in the Panama achievement has placed him so securely in the affections of his countrymen as to protect him absolutely from the plotting of Democracy and assure his vindication next November.

Theodore Roosevelt will occupy a unique place in our history. Admittedly he has won the greatest victory that it is possible to win in this Republic, a victory over ease, a victory over leisure. It is not difficult for a poor boy to climb and conquer in this Republic—that is the rule; that is the natural thing. Ask those captains of industry, who from places of power and responsibility issue their orders, whence came the original inspiration that ripened into their success, and they will point to the days when want and adversity forced the industry that won the victory.

That one who is born in the lap of luxury has the real struggle to make in this country to win for himself a name. It is so much easier to fight poverty than riches, for riches wears the shield of leisure, and leisure is such a gentle foe. Its bonds of imprisonment are silken bonds. It caresses and lulls and soothes into a contentment and complacency that is at once sweet and fatal.

That youth who can despise ease, which has come as a gratuity; who can place the proper stamp on luxury, which is the gift of others; who can mock at every invitation to idleness, which is the chief patrimony of the rich, and who can go out into the world with a clear head, an honest heart, and a passion for toil and achievement and win the laurels of success—sir, I lift my hat to such a man and am willing that his name shall be inscribed on the portals of Columbia's proudest temple.

I claim that by every standard fixed by fair and honest men Theodore Roosevelt has made a great President. A tragedy placed him in the White House. He went there while bells were tolling and at a time when grief had washed politics away. Sorrow consecrated his oath, and, turning from that sepulcher in northern Ohio, a nation in tears gave him its confidence. Responsibility and power did not dwarf him; they made him broad and great. He has faced unflinchingly every critical situation. He has solved every difficult problem.

The people believe in him; the people trust him. The people associate his life and work with the life and work of that good man whom he succeeded, and when the Republican party meets in national convention next June it will make his Administration its platform. It will inscribe his name upon its banner, and then the ranks will close up and the Republican party will march to another glorious victory. [Prolonged applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I believe that under the arrangement made in the House I have the same length of time that the gentleman from Indiana has occupied.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia has one hour and seventeen minutes.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I want to ask the other side of the House to submit to an adjournment now, as that one hour and seventeen minutes will keep us here entirely too long this evening.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TAWNEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 10954, the urgent deficiency bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ALASKA SALMON COMMISSION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication from the Secretary of Commerce and Labor submitting a preliminary report of the Alaska Salmon Commission, appointed in accordance with the instructions in my letter of November 8, 1902.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

WHITE HOUSE, January 27, 1904.

The message and accompanying documents were ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

SIOUX INDIANS IN SOUTH DAKOTA.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that upon the disposition of the bill now before the House, namely, the urgent deficiency bill, the bill (H. R. 10418) to ratify and amend an agreement with the Sioux Indians of the Rosebud Reservation, in South Dakota, be made the special order and that it continue to be the special order until disposed of, this order not to interfere with revenue or appropriation bills, or bills upon the Private Calendar, or with any business that is privileged under the rules, and that the bill be considered in the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. This, I understand, is a bill to open up the reservation in South Dakota.

Mr. BURKE. It is.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 10418 be considered in the House immediately after the completion of the urgent deficiency bill, and to remain a continuing order, not to interfere with revenue or appropriation bills, the Private Calendar, private business, or other privileged matters. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ASSISTANT CLERKS TO THE COMMITTEE ON ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged report.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 141.

Resolved, That the chairman of the Committee on Enrolled Bills be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint an assistant clerk to said committee, who shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House at the rate of $6 per day during the remainder of the present session.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

In lines 2 and 3 strike out the words "an assistant clerk" and insert the words "two assistant clerks."

In line 5, after the word "day," insert the word "each."

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Speaker, I will say by way of explanation of this resolution that it was considered in our committee this morning, and that the resolution is to authorize the employment of these clerks during the balance of the present session only, and it does not continue them at the next session of the present term. These two clerks were shown to the committee to be needed for facilitating the business in the House. It was found that the enrolled bills are being delayed, and there was considerable complaint on the part of the Senate regarding the matter. It is for these reasons solely that these additional clerks are required—purely and solely for the purpose of facilitating the business of the House. It is the custom of the House at the long session to employ additional clerks for this work from time to time, as the work grows greater and as the session advances.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. What committee is that?

Mr. GRAFF. The Committee on Enrolled Bills.

Mr. BARTLETT. Do I understand the gentleman to say that it was considered this morning in the committee?

Mr. GRAFF. Yes, sir.

Mr. BARTLETT. I had no notice of any meeting to-day.

Mr. GRAFF. I will say that the meeting of the committee was called, and that a page was sent around, and it was supposed that he saw all the members of the committee that it was possible for him to see, and if he did not notify the gentleman, it was because he was not accessible at that time.

Mr. BARTLETT. I was accessible at all times after the House met. I had no notice that the committee was to meet.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Were any of the minority members of the committee present?

Mr. GRAFF. Yes, sir.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. This is reported unanimously?

Mr. GRAFF. Yes, sir. Mr. EMERICH of Illinois was present.

Mr. BARTLETT. I want to say this: The committee was to meet on yesterday, and I was present at the time the committee was called to meet and there was no one there. The chairman of the committee was unwell or sick.

Mr. GRAFF. That was true.

Mr. BARTLETT. I inquired whether there would be a committee meeting to-day, or any regular time, and I was informed by the clerk there would be none. I received no notice of this meeting, and therefore I am unable to give the House, so far as I am concerned, any information about the resolution.

Mr. GRAFF. I will say to the gentleman that I had the same experience yesterday. I had received a written notice of a meeting on yesterday, and I was then informed that the chairman was sick, and afterwards, this morning, I received notice of the meeting of the committee orally.

Mr. BARTLETT. I received no such notice myself, and was not present for that reason.

Mr. GRAFF. I understand it was before the gentleman came to the Capitol this morning.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What is it, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I would like to ask the gentleman what it is?

Mr. GRAFF. The resolution is to authorize two assistant clerks for the Committee on Enrolled Bills, for the purpose of facilitating the business of the House. The committee took the matter up for the reason that there was an immediate exigency for the employment of these people.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How many people?

Mr. GRAFF. Two.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. For whom—for what committee?

Mr. GRAFF. Assistant clerks to the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The question was taken; and the amendments were agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS TOMBIGBEE RIVER BETWEEN CLARKE AND CHOCTAW COUNTIES, ALA.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of two bridge bills.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7287) to authorize the Mobile and West Alabama Railroad Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Tombigbee River between the counties of Clarke and Choctaw, Ala., in section 7, township 9, range 1 west of St. Stephens meridian.

The bill was read at length.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS WARRIOR RIVER IN TUSCALOOSA COUNTY, ALA.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I have another bill similar to that on the Tombigbee.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7288) to authorize the Mobile and West Alabama Railroad Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Warrior River in Tuscaloosa County, Ala., in section 3, township 21 south, range 9 west of Huntsville meridian.

The bill was read at length.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, and agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was read the third time, and passed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. MILLER, indefinitely, on account of important business.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 8038) to provide for the improvement in breeding of horses for general-purpose uses, and to enable the United States to procure better remounts for the cavalry and artillery service, and the same was referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 33 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Attorney-General, transmitting, in response to the inquiry of the House, a statement as to the horses and carriages maintained at public expense for use of officials in his Department—to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, submitting a report of the cost of the battle ships Connecticut and Louisiana to September 30, 1903—to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a report from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in relation to purchases during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1903, made in open market and otherwise, for necessaries for Indians—to the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Commissioners of the District of Columbia submitting an estimate of appropriation for public schools—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, public bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. LACEY, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 1344) to quiet certain land titles in the State of Mississippi, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 599); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. LITTLE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 10136) authorizing bail in criminal cases upon appeal in the courts of Indian Territory, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 600); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

PAYMENT OF DAMAGES FOR PERSONAL INJURY.

Mr. WARREN. I present a letter from the Secretary of the Navy and accompanying papers, that I ask to have printed as a miscellaneous document and referred to the Committee on Claims. It is with reference to a bill referred to that Department, which bill provided for the payment of damages for personal injury. As the committee is besought continually for information as to the attitude of the committee and the Department, I move that these papers be printed as a document.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PENROSE, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2172) for establishing further aids to navigation in Delaware Bay and River, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom the subject was referred, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. 3905) to establish aids to navigation in Delaware Bay and River; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. BERRY, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2818) permitting the building of a dam across the Mississippi River at or near the village of Sauk Rapids, Benton County, Minn., reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. FOSTER of Washington, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1734) to provide for the modification of the project for the improvement of the harbor of New Haven, Conn., reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. QUARLES, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2936) for the establishment of a depot for the engineer of the ninth light-house district at or near the city of Milwaukee, Wis., reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. NELSON, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9308) permitting the building of a dam across the Mississippi River between the counties of Wright and Sherburne, in the State of Minnesota, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3530) to provide for the construction of a light-house and buoy tender for the inspector of the eleventh light-house district, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2860) to further amend an act to amend an act approved January 21, 1903, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide for the use of timber and stone for domestic and industrial purposes in the Indian Territory,' approved June 6, 1900," reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. CLAPP, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3621) for the relief of Rufus Neal, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. BARD, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of the Northern California Indian Association, praying that lands be allotted to the landless Indians of the northern part of the State of California, moved that it be printed as a document; which was agreed to.

D'ANGERS'S BUST OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. CULLOM. I report from the Committee on Foreign Relations a joint resolution, for which I ask present consideration.

The joint resolution (S. R. 36) accepting a reproduction of the bust of Washington from certain citizens of the Republic of France, and tendering the thanks of Congress to the donors therefor, was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Whereas Count de Rochambeau, Marquis de Lafayette, Marquis de Grasse, Mr. Henry Jouin, and other citizens of France have tendered to the Government of the United States a reproduction of the bust of Washington by David d'Angers, which was destroyed in the fire at the Capitol in 1851, to be placed in the Capitol of the United States: Therefore,

Resolved, etc., That said gift is hereby accepted in the name of the people of the United States, and the thanks of Congress are tendered to the donors therefor.

SEC. 2. That the Joint Committee on the Library are hereby instructed to make arrangements for the formal presentation of said gift to Congress on a day to be hereafter fixed by said committee, and that said committee shall cause said bust to be placed in an appropriate and conspicuous place in the Capitol building.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of State be directed to transmit a copy of this joint resolution to the donors, through the Government of the French Republic.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. I have a letter from the Secretary of State, also one from M. Jusserand, the ambassador from France, one from our ambassador at Paris, and some other papers connected with this question. I think I ought to ask that the Senate print them as a document, so that there may be some record of this gift. On examination I find that when the original bust was accepted by this Government there seems to be no record of it in the Library or anywhere else.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent for the printing of certain letters and papers touching this matter which he sends to the desk. The Chair hears no objection, and the order is made.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE AND FORESTRY.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. STEWART submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be, and the same is hereby, authorized to employ during the Fifty-eighth Congress a stenographer, from time to time as may be necessary, to report such hearings as may be had by the committee or its subcommittees in connection with any matter which may be before the committee, and to have the same printed for its use; that it may sit during the sessions of the Senate or during the periods of its adjournment; that it may summon such witnesses as may be necessary to appear before the committee, and that any expense in connection with the foregoing shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

A. C. HAWLEY.

Mr. CULLOM submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be, and he is hereby, directed to place upon the messenger roll the name of A. C. Hawley, at an annual salary of $1,440, to be paid from the contingent fund until otherwise provided for, he having been dropped through the reorganization of the committees.

JOURNAL OF CONFEDERATE STATES CONGRESS.

Mr. FORAKER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate a copy of the Journal of the Provisional and the First and Second Congresses of the Confederate States of America, now in the custody of the War Department.

ABSTRACT OF TWELFTH CENSUS.

Mr. QUARLES. I submit a concurrent resolution and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The concurrent resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed and bound 30,000 copies of the Abstract of the Twelfth Census, 4,500 for the use of the Senate, 7,800 for the use of the House, and 17,700 to be distributed by the Director of the Census.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is inclined to think that the resolution ought to go to the Committee on Printing, as the cost will be more than $500.

Mr. QUARLES. Very well, let it go to the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The concurrent resolution will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

PROCEEDINGS OF NEW PANAMA CANAL COMPANY.

Mr. MORGAN. I present the official proceedings of the New Panama Canal Company at its meeting in Paris—its ordinary meeting, it is styled here in French—on the 30th day of December, 1903, accompanied by a report of the council of administration of that company and also of the commissionaires or auditors.

The document is in French. It is authentic. I have attempted to have it translated at the Library and also at the Bureau of American Republics, but without success, unless I would pay money for it. I ask that the paper be printed as a document for the use of the Senate, and that the Secretary of the Senate be instructed to have it translated into English.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama asks that the paper which he sends to the desk be printed as a Senate document, and that the Secretary be instructed to have it translated.

Mr. CULLOM. May I inquire of the Senator what it is? I did not hear his remarks.

Mr. MORGAN. It is the official proceedings of the New Panama Canal Company at Paris on the 30th day of December last.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Alabama? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

STATUES OF CHARLES CARROLL AND JOHN HANSON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the concurrent resolution of the Senate providing for the printing of 16,500 copies of the proceedings in Congress upon the acceptance of the statues of Charles Carroll of Carrollton and John Hanson, presented by the State of Maryland, which were, in line 7, to strike out "five" and insert "three;" and in line 8 to strike out "ten" and insert "twelve."

Mr. McCOMAS. In the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Printing, I move that the Senate nonconcur in the amendments of the House of Representatives and request a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. PLATT of New York, Mr. McCOMAS, and Mr. GORMAN were appointed.

TREATIES, LAWS, ETC., RELATING TO INDIAN AFFAIRS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the concurrent resolution of the Senate providing for the printing of 3,000 copies of Senate Document No. 452, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session, of the "Treaties, Laws, Executive Orders, etc., Relating to Indian Affairs," which was, in line 14, after the words "one thousand," to insert "five hundred."

Mr. STEWART. I move that the Senate agree to the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

STATUE OF KOSCIUSKO.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, referred to the Committee on the Library, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I herewith lay before the Congress a letter from the Polish organizations of the United States, and the report thereon from Col. Thomas W. Symons, Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds. In view of the recommendation of Colonel Symons I advise that the very patriotic offer of the Polish organizations be accepted, and that instead of the statue of Pulaski (which, in the judgment of his Polish compatriots should be an equestrian statue, and which it is now proposed to place in reservation 33, on the north side of Pennsylvania avenue, between Thirteenth and Fourteenth streets), there be a pedestrian statue of Kosciusko accepted by the Government, to be placed on one of the four corners of Lafayette Square. These four corners would thus ultimately be occupied by statues of Lafayette, Rochambeau, Von Steuben, and Kosciusko, all of whom in the stormy days which saw the birth of the Republic rendered service which can never be forgotten by our people.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

WHITE HOUSE, January 28, 1904.

NOTE.—The papers accompanied a similar message to the House of Representatives.

W. D. CRUM.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, which will be read:

The Secretary read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 27, 1904.

MY DEAR SIR: Replying to Senate's resolution of January 25, 1904, I beg to advise, William D. Crum was appointed collector at the port of Charleston, S. C., March 20, 1903, and a temporary commission issued. Mr. Crum qualified by executing bond for $50,000 and took oath of office March 30, 1903. Mr. Crum was again appointed December 7, 1903, and has given bond in the sum of $50,000 and took the oath of office on January 9, 1904. There has been no third appointment and no fourth appointment. The same information is contained in a letter to Hon. B. R. TILLMAN, under date of January 8, 1904, and which appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 25, 1904.

The resolution also asks: "Is Mr. Crum now in office; and if so, under what authority of law?" William D. Crum is de facto collector at the port of Charleston, S. C. Whether he holds his position under authority of law is determinable not by the executive department of the Government, but by the judiciary, and by that only. He is not receiving pay, because of the provisions of section 1761.

Very truly, yours,

L. M. SHAW.

Hon. WILLIAM P. FRYE,
President pro tempore United States Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication will lie on the table and be printed.

PIPE LINE THROUGH INDIAN LANDS.

Mr. STEWART. I am directed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3317) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to grant right of way for pipe lines through Indian lands, to report it favorably without amendment. There can not be any objection to the bill. It proposes to lay pipe lines which will do nobody any harm. There are parties who are ready to do the work and are waiting to go ahead with it. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be put upon its passage.

Mr. ALLISON. What is the bill?

Mr. STEWART. It allows the Secretary of the Interior to authorize pipe lines to convey oil and gas through Indian lands in the Indian Territory.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill just reported by him. It will be read.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. How long is the easement to continue under the bill? For all time? I think it ought to be pretty well regulated.

Mr. STEWART. Just pipe lines underground will not do anybody much harm.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not know. Some one else might want to put pipe lines there.

Mr. STEWART. There is no exclusive right given by the bill.

Mr. SPOONER. Is there a reservation in it? Is the right reserved to Congress to amend the act?

Mr. STEWART. I do not think there is. There should be such a reservation.

Mr. ALLISON. There is no limitation on the power of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. STEWART. Let that be put in the bill.

Mr. SPOONER. Reserving the right to alter and amend.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have just looked at the bill. I had occasion to examine it a little more fully a few days ago, as I had introduced a bill which is now pending on the Calendar reported favorably. That bill proposed to insert "oil and pipe lines" in section 3 of the Indian appropriation act, which I have here on my desk.

Mr. STEWART. I have no objection to the bill going over.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have compared that bill with this. Practically the only difference between them is that in the bill I presented after the word "telegraph" the words "oil and gas pipe" were inserted. As I understand this bill it reenacts section 3 and puts in all the provisions that were in section 3, just as they were in the bill. So practically it is only inserting those words. However, I have no objection to its lying over. I have the original act and all the other acts. I happened to look at this bill, finding that it was on the same subject. I have not had time to read the two, but so far as I have been able to discover the only difference in the world is that this bill reenacts the old law, so that it will be an independent law.

Mr. STEWART. There is no objection to the bill going over if any Senator wishes to look at it further. I think that it had better lie over, because if the one already reported answers the purpose it can be called up and passed. There is no objection to its lying over to see whether it does.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not object. Section 3 of the act of March 3, 1901, is the section that is practically reenacted by the bill. The bill I introduced is Senate bill 2302, and it is on the Calendar now. It just provided for the insertion after the word "telegraph" of the words "oil and gas pipe;" so that it would read "telegraph, oil and gas pipe lines." This bill puts those words in and reenacts the provision. There ought to be a provision in the bill to alter, amend, and repeal, as a matter of course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move as an amendment, "that Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act."

Mr. STEWART. Let it come in as a separate section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Missouri will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill, as a new section:

SEC. —. Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RELATIONS WITH NEW GRANADA OR COLOMBIA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution 102, by Mr. NEWLANDS, requesting the President to negotiate a new treaty with the United States of Colombia, providing for the cession of all rights that they may claim to have in the Isthmus of Panama.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

HYGIENIC CONDITIONS, ETC., ON ISTHMUS OF PANAMA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution 109, by Mr. MORGAN, directing that certain official documents, hearings before the Committee on Interoceanic Canals in 1902 and statements of Merrill A. Teague, shall be referred to the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine.

Mr. HOPKINS. I suggest that the Committee on Interoceanic Canals has jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the resolution. If agreeable to the Senator from Alabama, I should like to have the resolution lie over until the chairman of that committee, the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HANNA], is present. It may be that he will not share in my views, but I wish to have such action taken as will be agreeable to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. MORGAN. I have no objection to that course, if the resolution goes over subject to call.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama asks that the resolution shall lie on the table subject to call. It will remain on the table without prejudice. It holds its former position.

CORRESPONDENCE RELATIVE TO PANAMA TREATY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution 110, by Mr. MORGAN, directing the Secretary of State to send to the Senate a copy of a dispatch or letter dated January 22, 1904, relating to the withdrawal or abandonment of all amendments to the Hay-Varilla treaty, etc.

Mr. MORGAN. I am informed that that paper will be laid before the Senate in executive session, and being under that engagement, I withdraw the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is withdrawn.

DIPLOMATIC CORRESPONDENCE RELATIVE TO PANAMA, ETC.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the Calendar under Rule VIII.

Mr. CULBERSON. I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that resolution 104 ought to be laid before the Senate now. If not, I ask that it be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The trouble is that some resolutions have been laid on the table subject to call, and others have been laid on the table under the rule. This resolution was laid on the table subject to call.

Mr. CULBERSON. I call it up at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution 104, by Mr. CULBERSON, requesting the President to inform the Senate whether all correspondence, etc., between the Department of State and the legation of the United States at Bogota, has been sent to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I do not agree, so far as I am concerned, to the resolution as it now stands. In the first place, the resolution goes back fifty or sixty years probably, if it is the purpose to go back as far as the canal question has been before the country, and there is no evidence that it does not. If the resolution passes, I desire that it shall be amended so as to fix a date behind which the Department may not have to investigate, because we would not get an answer within two months unless we furnished them clerks.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, in answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Illinois, I will state that it is not the purpose of the resolution, of course, to go beyond the correspondence in reference to the Hay-Herran treaty.

Mr. SPOONER. Then let the resolution say so.

Mr. ALLISON. Then say so.

Mr. CULBERSON. It does, I think, say so in effect, without using that expression.

Mr. CULLOM. I suggest that after the word "notes," in line 10, the words "beginning with March, 1903," be inserted. That is the date of the ratification of the Hay-Herran treaty by the Senate. Then I would also suggest——

Mr. CULBERSON. What is the suggestion of the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. CULLOM. That the resolution shall be so amended as to limit it to March, 1903, which is the date of the ratification of the Hay-Herran treaty by the Senate.

Mr. CULBERSON. I understand there is a great deal of correspondence on this general subject leading up to the negotiation of the treaty, and we ought not to be bound by the date of the ratification by the Senate.

Mr. CULLOM. It is the Hay-Herran treaty that I am talking about. If you fix the date I state you certainly will get everything that anyone has any special interest in in connection with the subject. If the Senator wants an answer at some time it seems to me that it is in the interest of a prompt answer that the Department shall not be required to go back so far as the resolution would seem to require.

Mr. CULBERSON. I have stated that the resolution is not intended to go back beyond the negotiations leading up to the Hay-Herran treaty. With that understanding, I have no objection to any amendment that will make that purpose clearer than the resolution now does.

Mr. CULLOM. I think the words "beginning with March 17, 1903," which is the date of ratification here, should be inserted, and the question had not been discussed much, if at all, except between the Secretary of State and the minister or chargé d'affaires, who is here.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, a great deal of correspondence has already been sent to the Senate, as I understand it, between the Secretary of State and the representative of Colombia, leading to the negotiation of the Hay-Herran treaty. We think there are other papers relating to the same subject which have not yet been sent; and what we desire is to have the correspondence sent here covering the negotiation of this treaty up to the time of its ratification by the Senate on the 22d of January, 1903, and any subsequent correspondence leading to its attempted ratification by the Republic of Colombia. The suggestion of the Senator from Illinois will not accomplish that purpose.

Mr. CULLOM. What I desire is that the resolution shall be so framed as that when it is adopted—if it shall be adopted—there will be some point of time beyond which the Department shall not have to go in order to furnish the documents.

Mr. CULBERSON. We are willing, Mr. President, that it may not go back beyond June 28, 1902—the date on which the President approved the Spooner Act—if that will be satisfactory.

Mr. CULLOM. I am willing for that, but I want some date by which the Department can be governed.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will modify the resolution by inserting after the word "canal," in line 5, the words "since June 28, 1902."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be so modified.

Mr. CULLOM. I have no objection to that modification. All I want is to get the information sent in here at some time or other, and give the Department a chance to know what they have got to furnish.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate agree to the resolution as modified?

Mr. CULLOM. I am not willing to agree to the resolution as it now stands. I propose to amend by adding at the end of the resolution the words "if not in his judgment incompatible with the public interest;" and I insist on that amendment being adopted.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask that the Secretary will now read the resolution as I have modified it and as it would stand if the amendment suggested by the Senator from Illinois should be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested to inform the Senate whether all the correspondence and notes between the Department of State and the legation of the United States at Bogota, and between either of these and the Government of Colombia for the construction of an isthmian canal since June 28, 1902, and all the correspondence and notes between the United States and any of its officials or representatives or the Government of Panama, concerning the separation of Panama from Colombia, have been sent to the Senate and, if not, that he be requested to send the remaining correspondence and notes to the Senate in executive session, if not in his judgment incompatible with the public interest.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM].

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to enter into a discussion of the general subject of the Panama question, but to confine myself strictly to the pending resolution, and particularly to the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois.

The resolution is not intended to call, and does not call, for any personal correspondence on the part of any official of the Government of the United States, nor does it seek any information of an extraneous character. It is confined distinctly and expressly to a request to send to the Senate official correspondence, and official correspondence only, relating to the negotiation and subsequent conduct of the Hay-Herran treaty and the incidents connected with Panama.

Mr. President, as an original proposition, I do not believe that it can be successfully refuted that the Senate is entitled to this correspondence. The President is not authorized by the Constitution to negotiate a treaty wholly by himself, but treaties must be negotiated by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate, and certainly, Mr. President, the Senate is entitled to all the official information which the President has in his possession upon which its judgment and advice is asked to the ratification of a treaty. Certainly the President can not retain in his possession matters of an official character included in correspondence between himself and the other contracting government which would lead him to negotiate a treaty which he is entitled to withhold from the Senate upon which it shall pass its judgment as to whether it shall advise and consent to such a treaty.

Not only is that true as an original proposition, Mr. President, but, as I understand it, this resolution accords with precedents on the subject; and the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois ought not to be adopted. I have not devoted all the time, perhaps, that I should devote to an examination of this question; but, so far as I have been able to discover from diligent inquiry and search among the precedents of our Government, and so far as others have been able to ascertain who have investigated this matter for me, no resolution has ever been adopted by the Senate, particularly when any point was made upon it, that when the Senate was asking for information relating to the negotiation of a treaty to be submitted to it in confidence by the President, it should be left to his judgment and discretion whether that information should be sent here.

This resolution does not ask the President to send this information in open session; it does not ask him to send this correspondence for the purpose of publication; but it expressly requests him to send it to the Senate in executive session, with all the secrecy and with all the confidence those terms at least ought to import in this body.

While I will not, Mr. President, undertake to recite at length the precedents on this subject, I do ask leave to call attention to certain transactions in our history which bear strongly upon this proposition.

In the message of President Washington March 30, 1796, sent to the House of Representatives, he declined to send information requested by the House upon the distinct ground that the treaty which he was then discussing was not one in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was required, or upon which the House of Representatives was entitled, under the Constitution, to express an opinion, indicating most clearly the opinion of President Washington that, if it had been a request from the Senate for this information pending the ratification of a treaty, the information would have been sent.

In a message of President Polk, dated January 12, 1848, answering a resolution of the House of Representatives, President Polk quotes from this message of President Washington in 1796, insisting under the rule laid down there and for the reason given there, that the House of Representatives was not entitled to the information, but clearly indicating in the argument that, if the request had been made by the Senate, the information would have been sent. In a message of President Polk, dated February 29, 1849, he uses this language:

In compliance with the resolution of the Senate passed in "executive session" on yesterday, requesting the President "to communicate to the Senate, in confidence, the entire correspondence between Mr. Trist and the Mexican commissioners from the time of his arrival in Mexico until the time of the negotiation of the treaty submitted to the Senate, and also the entire correspondence between Mr. Trist and the Secretary of State in relation to his negotiations with the Mexican commissioners, also all the correspondence between General Scott and the Government and between General Scott and Mr. Trist since the arrival of Mr. Trist in Mexico which may be in the possession of the Government," I transmit herewith the correspondence called for.

Mr. President, that was a resolution which passed, it is true, in executive session, calling upon the President to submit to the Senate, in confidence, the correspondence in question; but I take it that there is no special force in the fact that the information was called for while the Senate was sitting in executive session rather than in open session, because the information was to be sent to the Senate in confidence, as called for in the resolution now under consideration.

In another message of President Polk to the Senate February 9, 1849, this appears:

In compliance with the resolution of the Senate of the 6th instant, requesting the President to cause to be laid before that body, in "executive or open session, in his discretion, any instructions given to Ambrose H. Sevier and Nathan Clifford, commissioned as ministers plenipotentiary on the part of the United States to the Government of Mexico, or to either of said ministers, prior to the ratification by the Government of Mexico of the treaty of peace between the United States and that Republic," and certain correspondence and other papers specified in the said resolution, I communicate herewith a report from the Secretary of State, together with copies of the documents called for.

Mr. SPOONER. Was that a Senate resolution?
Mr. CULBERSON. Yes; a Senate resolution.
Mr. ALLISON. Will not the Senator read the resolution?
Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly. It is as follows:

Requesting the President to cause to be laid before that body, in "executive or open session, in his discretion, any instructions given to Ambrose H. Sevier and Nathan Clifford," etc.

In that resolution of the Senate the President was requested to give the information to the Senate either in open session or in secret session, as his judgment might dictate.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question only for information?
Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly.
Mr. SPOONER. Was that resolution introduced in legislative session or in executive session?
Mr. CULBERSON. It appears to have been introduced in legislative session. At least, the contrary does not appear, and I take it it was introduced in legislative session of the Senate. I should not think, however, that that would be of any special consequence; but if that is a matter of any particular importance, I presume the one I am now about to read will answer the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin.
Mr. SPOONER. I did not make any suggestion. I asked for information.
Mr. CULBERSON. I think the question was suggestive.

On March 8, 1848, President Polk sent a short message to the Senate, as follows:

In answer to the resolution of the Senate of this date, requesting the President to communicate to that body "confidentially, any additional dispatches which may have been received from Mr. Trist, and especially those which are promised by him in his letter to Mr. Buchanan of the 2d of February last, if the same have been received," I have to state that all the dispatches which have been received from Mr. Trist have been heretofore communicated to the Senate.

Mr. President, that is a resolution in perfect consonance with the one which is being considered by the Senate at this time. It was passed in open session, and the information was requested to be sent to the Senate confidentially, as is the information requested to be sent to the Senate in confidence or in executive session in the resolution we are now considering.

I therefore submit that in no case, so far as I have been able to discover, either by examination myself or through the aid of others, particularly when the question is called to the attention of the Senate, has any resolution ever been adopted by the Senate asking the President to communicate information in confidence to the Senate for the purpose of considering a treaty in which it has ever been left to his judgment and discretion as to whether that information shall be sent, and it occurs to us that it ought not to be done in this case.

The information is important, no doubt. We have information—we have direct information—that some documents and some official correspondence which have passed between our Government and the officials of Colombia bearing upon this general question have not been sent to the Senate heretofore in communications of a voluntary character made by the President, and we ask that it be done now, in order that we may have the full information here when we are called upon to advise and consent to the ratification of this treaty.

Mr. CULLOM. I want to assure the Senator, whether those words are in or out, that if the resolution shall be passed, he will get all the information there is in the Department which is pertinent to the general subject.

The thing which I am inclined to complain of is that there is, on the part of some Senators, a disposition or want of confidence that the President of the United States is willing to give information that is in possession of the executive department, that therefore there is something behind, and that the Senate ought to pass a resolution directing and insisting upon the President furnishing further information, which certain Senators seem to think is lying back in some secret corner.

Mr. President, it is a very common thing for the Senate of the United States in executive session and in legislative session to pass resolutions referring to treaties with the words inserted, "if in the judgment of the President it be not incompatible with the public interest to furnish the information;" and when I insist upon those words going into this resolution, I want the Senator from Texas and everybody else to understand that I am just as anxious as anyone can be that every single particle of information that is in the Department which is pertinent to the subject shall be furnished by the President, and I have no more doubt that it will be done than I have that I stand here in the presence of this Senate.

Now, I want to call the attention of the Senate for a moment to the very first resolution which my eye lights upon, that has been passed by this body only recently, and during the life of the late distinguished Senator Sherman:

Resolved, That the President is requested, if it is not in his opinion incompatible with the public interest, to send to the Senate all the correspondence between the United States and Great Britain, and other papers relating to the treaty of arbitration now pending in the Senate.

This resolution calling for information which was adopted in executive session, was introduced by the late Senator Sherman, and it was answered. I do not know what the answer was, for I have not had time to look it up.

That is one resolution, and I believe the Senator from Texas intimated to me the other day that if I could find one such resolution he would be very much gratified if I would show it to him. I did not happen to have the time to do the latter, but there is the resolution.

Mr. CULBERSON. What is the date of the resolution?
Mr. CULLOM. The date is 1897, only a few years ago, and the resolution was introduced in this body by the late Senator Sherman.
Mr. CULBERSON. Has the Senator a copy of the resolution?
Mr. CULLOM. Here is the thing itself. I had it copied from the Journal of the Senate.
Mr. CULBERSON. I did not understand from the reading whether or not the resolution was adopted in executive session.
Mr. CULLOM. Here is another. I do not know whether this resolution refers to a treaty, but I have taken the pains, Mr. President, by the aid of my clerk, to go over the records and see whether anything could be found on this subject generally. I do not know, as I said, whether this resolution has reference to a treaty or not, but I will read it:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to inform the Senate whether Great Britain or any other nation has protested against or objected to the making of the treaty with the Republic of Cuba which is now before the Senate, and if any such protest or objection has been made, the character thereof.

That resolution, which was introduced by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], was agreed to. It does not refer directly to inquiries as to what the President did about the matter, but asked for other information.

Mr. LODGE. May I ask the Senator if these are executive resolutions?
Mr. CULLOM. Yes; executive resolutions.
Mr. LODGE. Taken from the Executive Journals of the Senate?
Mr. CULLOM. Yes; they are taken from the Journals of the executive sessions of the Senate. And I wish to say that anything which was introduced in legislative session would not appear in the Journals of the executive sessions of the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. I want to ask the Senator if any point is made that this resolution is not in executive session? It does not make any difference, it seems to me, whether such a resolution is passed in executive session or not if it asks that the information be sent to the Senate in executive session.

Mr. CULLOM. That is true. I think, myself, however, while I make no point upon it, it would have been more apt and appropriate, as the resolution asks for an answer in executive session, that the resolution should have been introduced in executive session.

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CULLOM. I do.

Mr. CLAY. Is it not true that the Senate is a part of the treaty-making power, and participates with the Executive in making treaties, and that the Executive can not make a treaty without the consent of the Senate?

Mr. CULLOM. Most assuredly.

Mr. CLAY. Then, is it not true that the Senate in executive session would be entitled to all the information the President himself had, and all that aided him in making the treaty—every fact and circumstance connected with it—especially if we desired it in executive session?

Mr. CULLOM. Everybody knows that the Constitution makes the Senate a part of the treaty-making power.

There is no purpose on the part of the President to withhold information, but I take it that he does—though I do not know whether he does or not—insist that the usual courtesy which has been extended to other Presidents shall be extended to him. He will furnish every scrap of information that is in possession of the executive department, but I insist that the words I have suggested shall go into the resolution as the usual expression of later days when calling upon the President for information.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. CULLOM. I do.

Mr. TILLMAN. Suppose the President does not.

Mr. CULLOM. Then we can deal with the subject when that time comes.

Mr. TILLMAN. But as part of the treaty-making power it seems to me we have to guard against the precedent of a surrender of the right, even in calling for these things, of demanding them rather than begging for them. No one wants to treat the President with any discourtesy; there is not the slightest intention to cast any imputation upon his honesty or his loyalty or his truthfulness or anything of that sort, but it is merely to give notice that certain papers are wanted, and that we, as part of the treaty-making power, have a right to those things. It is not any discourtesy to let the President understand that we have the right and to let him understand that we understand our rights.

Mr. CULLOM. The President of the United States has the right—and I insist upon it—to refuse or to comply, as he sees proper, whether you put the words in the resolution or not.

Mr. TILLMAN. Does the Senator say that the President has a right to refuse to send papers of this sort to the Senate in executive session?

Mr. CULLOM. I do say so.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator of course has a right to his opinion; but I should be very sorry to see the Senate of the United States surrender one of its prerogatives and constitutional rights to anybody at any time or anywhere.

Mr. HALE. Let me make a suggestion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. CULLOM. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE. I wish to ask the Senator if he does not recall, as other Senators will recall, the circumstances taking place here when, upon nominations which must be confirmed by the Senate before commissions issue, the Senate under the leadership of the then veteran Senator from Vermont, Mr. Edmunds, insisted that the Senate had a right, as a part of the appointing power, to ask the President, and to compel him if need be, to send in all papers relating to nominations and the reason for the nominations, or for removal in case of a nomination in place of a removal? Some of us stood here for days waging that contest. President Cleveland declined, and stated squarely that he could not and would not send to the Senate such papers; and we on this side of the Chamber backed out of the controversy upon the presumption, the theory, that there was a discretion underlying in the President, and that we could not compel him.

Mr. COCKRELL. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. HALE. If the Senator will wait a moment, I will yield.

Mr. CULLOM. I have yielded to the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE].

Mr. HALE. Now, in these cases—and that is the practical view of it, though there is great force in the contention of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] that upon a treaty the Senate should receive all possible information in the hands of the President—the universal courtesy has always obtained of granting the discretionary power to the President in the requests which are made by the Senate. I never knew it otherwise. It is no use in talking about the difficulty of crossing a stream until you reach it.

There never was, and never will be, a President who will decline upon a treaty to send to the Senate, a part of the treaty-making power, information upon the subject, unless it happens to be of that intricate and subtle kind that ought not to be communicated to anybody, and we shall never find a President declining to answer, if we send the customary message, including the courtesy that has always obtained, and the answer will satisfy us. If it does not, then we can deal with that situation; but we need not anticipate such a case by leaving out of the resolution the customary phrase.

I am sorry the Senator from Texas, who is a conservative man in his instincts, wants to violate the precedents. I am sorry that he has precipitated this question upon the Senate now, when there really never will be any occasion, when the answer is returned, for us to complain.

If there is we can deal with it; I do not know just how, but we can then express ourselves and can exhaust whatever power there is in the Senate. But I should hope that it would not be insisted upon now. Let us wait and see if the President in any way will even take the ground that President Cleveland did, that he would not send to the Senate certain information he had.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator from Maine yield for a question?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. COCKRELL. Did not the demand there go beyond asking for papers relating to appointments and call for those relating to removals?

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Missouri probably did not notice it, but I said in my remarks that it involved the question not only of an appointment, but of removal, where an appointment was based upon a removal, and the President declined.

Mr. COCKRELL. I remember the discussion very distinctly——

Mr. HALE. As the Senator knows, we were here for weeks on it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I remember distinctly that I was very much opposed to the course of the President, and that the then Senator from Tennessee, Mr. Harris, and I both protested to the President against refusing to send in the papers relating to appointments. We did not think the Senate had any right to ask in regard to removals.

Mr. HALE. And the President maintained his attitude.

Mr. COCKRELL. He substantially maintained it, and yet, I understand, finally sent in all the papers relating to appointments, but not those relating to removals.

Mr. CULLOM. Of course. He would have done it anyway.

Mr. HALE. And the Senate abandoned its contention—abandoned its resolution.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not think it might be considered an abandonment. There were only two or three speeches made on the Democratic side sustaining the President in his position. I know that. Finally the majority then, as now, acted upon all the nominations and were satisfied with the papers that he sent and did not call for additional ones.

Mr. HALE. "Times change and we change with them," and it is worth while to remember that as issues shift one side takes a position to-day and the other side the same position to-morrow; and it ought to be a monition to us not to be very forward in seeking to innovate in these cases.

Mr. MITCHELL. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Maine to the fact that there were three resolutions——

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President——

Mr. MITCHELL. I believe I have the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. CULLOM. I am inclined to yield to anybody who wants to speak.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois has the floor, and he yielded to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. MITCHELL. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Maine to the fact that there were three resolutions, embodied all in one paper, bearing upon the general question discussed at that time. One of the resolutions, the last one, is the one to which the Senator refers, and my recollection is that the two former resolutions were adopted while the latter one was rejected.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Illinois yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. CULLOM. Briefly.

Mr. TILLMAN. It seems to me we are contending here from different points of view, and as the Senator from Maine intimated a moment ago as to the whirligig of time and the ups and downs of politics change majorities we might swap positions very easily. But there is a principle involved here which was not involved in the Cleveland case. A treaty is a law of the land. An appointment is not a law of the land. It is not binding upon anybody.

Mr. ALDRICH. Oh, yes; it is.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senate agrees to an appointment, the appointee becomes a part of the machinery of government, it is true, but somebody else could take his place very readily, and it would not make any difference.

If Senators on the other side are merely contending for courtesy to the President, without the Senate surrendering any of its rights, I do not think any man on this side would hesitate for a moment to pay the President all proper courtesy and respect. But the whole question, as it appears to me, is whether or not in the matter of a treaty the Senate should ever consent to the view that it is within the discretion of the President to refuse information which would throw light on the treaty and enable Senators to pass upon it intelligently.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I think there is a principle involved in the insertion of those words, because the President of the United States is the head of one branch of the Government, and he has a right to his view of his duty under the Constitution as well as we have. But I say that in fact the resolution will be answered fully and completely and as truthfully as any executive officer ever answered a resolution in his life and as truthfully as anybody can answer anything.

Mr. HALE. And everybody will be satisfied.

Mr. CULLOM. And everybody will be satisfied, as the Senator from Maine says. This is an effort, apparently, on the part of some of our friends to get an advantage. After they had caucused on this matter, if I may be allowed to say so, for a week or two, this was the result. Mr. President, there never was a President in the White House in the history of the Government who would be further from prevaricating upon any question, whether it affected him or otherwise, than the present President of the United States. But I did not rise to discuss the resolution at very great length.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. I do not think I ought to allow the opportunity to pass without suggesting to the Senator that the inference he would seem to draw from the introduction of this resolution in its present form is entirely unjustified.

Mr. CULLOM. I withdraw any suggestion of that sort which I may have made.

Mr. CULBERSON. There is no indication that in presenting this resolution there is any hope on the part of anybody to catch the President in an untruth, or anything of the kind. The resolution simply purposes, Mr. President, what it imports on its face, that if there is any other official correspondence on this subject——

Mr. CULLOM. If there is, you will get it.

Mr. CULBERSON. That the President is requested to sent it. The President has never said in any message to this body that he has sent all the correspondence, and as soon as he says, if he does, that he has sent all the correspondence on the subject, of course everybody on this side of the Chamber as well as on the other will accept his statement as entirely correct.

Mr. CULLOM. I was proceeding to give instances as to what we had done heretofore, so as to show to the Senator and all Senators that the insertion of the words which I suggested should be put in the resolution is the most common thing to be done when we are asking the President for information. For instance, I read a resolution introduced by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] who has just been speaking:

Resolved, That the President be, and hereby is, requested, if not in his judgment incompatible with the public interest, to send to the Senate all official correspondence not heretofore communicated with the British Government since October, 1891, relative to the Bering Sea controversy.

[Agreed to March 25, 1892.]

Those words were in that resolution. The resolution was adopted, and I have no doubt, though I did not follow it far enough to speak with certainty, that the resolution was answered fully.

Again, on June 21, 1893, Mr. Vilas—this was during the Administration of Mr. Cleveland—offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, if in his opinion compatible with the public interests, to furnish to the Senate the correspondence between the Department of State and the Government of France relative to the pending extradition treaty between the two Governments, and any information in his possession relative to such treaty acquired since it was first submitted to the Senate.

I have my hands full of references to such resolutions, many of them exactly like that.

Mr. COCKRELL. Have you the resolution which was passed in 1886 calling on President Cleveland for information about offices?

Mr. CULLOM. No; I do not think I have it.

Mr. LODGE. That was an executive resolution.

Mr. CULLOM. It was an executive resolution?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I should like to ask the Senator whether in the research which has been made of precedents any resolution has been found that does not leave to the President discretionary power?

Mr. CULLOM. Yes; there have been such resolutions. I will read such a one, which I believe I have in my hand at this moment. The following resolution was submitted in executive session January 9, 1844:

Resolved, That the President be requested to lay before the Senate confidentially, the Senate being in executive session, a copy of any instructions which may have been given by the Executive to the American minister in England on the subject of the title to and occupation of the Territory of Oregon since the 4th of March, 1841; also a copy of any correspondence which may have passed between this Government and that of Great Britain in relation to that subject since that time.

It turned out, I believe, that the President declined to comply with the resolution. There was a resolution in which there was no incompatibility phrase and yet the President declined to answer it.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Will the Senator state the time when that resolution was adopted?

Mr. CULLOM. In 1844.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. 1844?

Mr. CULLOM. January 9, 1844.

Mr. MALLORY. Does the Senator know why the President declined?

Mr. CULLOM. I have not had time to run down the question.

Mr. MALLORY. It was not because he construed the absence of the incompatibility clause as a discourtesy to him or anything of that kind?

Mr. CULLOM. I have not had time to look up the question of the reason.

Mr. MALLORY. I think not.

Mr. CULLOM. I have not had time to look up the reason in any case. But in the time I had I ran over, with the help of my clerks, the journals of the executive sessions to see just exactly what had taken place in dealing with such resolutions.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. I want to suggest to the Senator from Illinois that he is now reading from the proceedings in executive session.

Mr. GORMAN. It has all been made public since then.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not think those proceedings have been made public, although I do not know. I merely call attention to it.

Mr. GORMAN. They have all been made public.

Mr. ALLISON. They are all public? I would like to know whether that is the fact.

Mr. CULLOM. I think the point the Senator from Iowa makes is well taken as to some of these resolutions, although it did not occur to me at the moment.

Mr. ALLISON. The resolution of 1844 undoubtedly has been made public.

Mr. LODGE. They have been made public down to 1890.

Mr. GORMAN. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. Down to 1890 and not since; and there have been resolutions read dated 1897.

Mr. CULLOM. Yes. The first one I read ought not to have been read. It did not occur to me at the moment, however.

Mr. COCKRELL. They have all been made public up to 1890.

Mr. CULLOM. Senator Weller, on June 19, 1852, submitted the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interest, whether any propositions have been made by the King of the Sandwich Islands to cede or convey the sovereignty of said islands to the United States, and, if so, to communicate to the Senate all official information in his possession touching said subject.

On June 26 the President replied that he had taken the request into consideration, "But the conclusion which I have arrived at is that the public interest would not be promoted, but, on the contrary, might, under circumstances of possible occurrence, be seriously endangered if it were now to be complied with."

The President answered that frankly and stated the reason why he was not disposed to comply with it, and so would any other President if there was anything which he could not, in his judgment, lay before the Senate either in executive session or in legislative session. This was in executive session.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. COCKRELL. There was no treaty pending to which that related?

Mr. CULLOM. Does the Senator refer to the Weller resolution? No; I think there was not.

Mr. COCKRELL. There was no action of the Executive pending for consideration at the time when the request for information was refused.

Mr. CULLOM. "Whether any propositions have been made by the King of the Sandwich Islands to cede or convey any portion of the territory of said islands to the United States; and if so, to communicate to the Senate," etc., I do not know.

Mr. COCKRELL. But there was no treaty pending——

Mr. CULLOM. No treaty was pending.

Mr. COCKRELL. About which the Senate had any right to call upon him for correspondence.

Mr. CULLOM. He declined to answer, and gave the reasons why.

Mr. CULBERSON. And very properly. It had not been consummated.

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. Mason, on June 25, 1852, introduced the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform the Senate, if not in his opinion incompatible with the public interest, whether any convention or compact has been entered into on the part of the United States and Great Britain whereby the two Governments jointly recommend or advise Nicaragua and the Mosquito Indians on matters affecting their several and respective boundaries, etc.

That comes as near a treaty as you could possibly come and not actually be making one in terms.

President Fillmore declined to furnish the information, stating:

Any information which may be in the possession of the Executive on these subjects shall in due time be laid before the Senate, but it is apprehended that it would not comport with the public interests to communicate it under existing circumstances.

Mr. COCKRELL. The treaty had not been negotiated.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not know whether it had or not. They were dealing with the Mosquito Indians of Nicaragua.

Mr. COCKRELL. Nothing was completed.

Mr. CULLOM. Nothing was completed, and he declined to give any further information at that time.

Now, here is one from the late Senator Bayard.

The following resolution was submitted by Mr. Bayard on January 16, 1856, was agreed to, and the President complied with it:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate, if it be not incompatible with the public interest, the correspondence between the Secretary of State and Edward Howell, while the latter was acting as consul to Matanzas, in relation to the estates of decedent American citizens in the island of Cuba.

Ordered, That the Secretary lay the said resolution before the President of the United States.

Now, I will not take up the time of the Senate in running over these resolutions longer, because there are so many of them. I desire to say in perfect frankness that Webster introduced the words "if not incompatible with the public interest" in the first resolution calling upon the President in executive session for information that I have found. Of course in the early history of the Government, when meager records were kept, it is difficult to get full information, but Webster seems to have been the first man to introduce those words into such resolutions in executive session, calling upon the President for information of whatever nature.

Mr. President, I think the Senator having charge of this resolution ought to allow it to pass with those words in it, if he wants the information he is calling for; and I assure him that if we pass it in that way, limiting it in point of time so that the Government can answer it within a reasonable period, he will get a full and complete answer in a very few days.

I do not care to say anything more.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, I feel that I ought to assure the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, in addition to what the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], the author of this resolution, has said, that so far as I know—and I think I know that much—there has not been, there is not now, and there is not likely to be at any time a disposition on this side of the Chamber, in framing communications to the President of the United States, to couch them otherwise than in the most respectful language, and that the matter of the resolution itself shall be such that it can not be tortured into a desire to reflect upon the President of the United States. We have too much respect for that office. That, however, will not and ought not to prevent us from criticising the acts of the President of the United States with frankness, but always within proper bounds.

In the matter of the resolution which is pending, I am quite certain that the words "within the discretion of the President" were left out purposely and properly. I know the records show that the action of this body has been in both forms. The President of the United States has frequently been requested to send to this body all the information that he might have in the Departments when a treaty was pending in the Senate. It is true that in later years, I think in nearly every case, the words "within his discretion" or "if not incompatible with the public interest" have been inserted. In every case the President has responded frankly, sometimes telling the Senate he has furnished all the correspondence and all the information.

In some cases, in one great case particularly, the President of the United States said it would not do, in the then condition, to furnish the Senate with all the information, but that the Senate and each Senator who was compelled to deal with the question should have the information at the Department, and that he would furnish every facility for them to see the original documents. But, Mr. President, there has never been any hesitation on the part of the Senate, under any Administration, in requesting every single item of information within the possession of the President or of the Secretary of State.

During President Polk's Administration Mr. Webster offered and had passed a resolution in this body while the treaty with Mexico was pending and while the armies were facing each other, only divided by a river. At that time the question of further conflict was pending, and the statement had been made in the public press, through the attacks upon Mr. Polk's Administration, that methods were used to bring about a result, and that for that purpose $3,000,000 had been placed in the hands of an agent of the Government, the secret service of the United States. No more delicate position could be occupied by a President than President Polk occupied at that time, and yet Mr. Webster in this body offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform the Senate of the terms of the authority given to Nathaniel P. Trist to draw for the $3,000,000 authorized by the act of the 2d of March, 1847.

President Polk did not refuse to furnish it to the Senate. The treaty was pending, as this treaty is pending now, and the call was made for the specific document. The reply came, and came in confidence. It does not appear in any document printed by the Senate.

Again, as the Senator from Illinois has referred to a resolution requesting the President of the United States to send to the Senate all the correspondence relating to the great controversy with Great Britain as to the northern boundary, which threatened war at any time, I will say a word on that subject. He sent in not only the suggestions as to the treaty that was proposed to be made, but, the Senate of the United States in 1846 having asked for specific information as to the correspondence with Mr. McLane, the agent or minister of the United States, in his reply, which will be found in the Presidents' Messages and Documents, between 1841 and 1849, on page 455, he said:

WASHINGTON, July 21, 1846.

To the Senate of the United States:

I herewith transmit, in compliance with the request of the Senate in their resolution of the 17th of June, 1846, a report of the Secretary of State, together with a copy of all "the dispatches and instructions relative to the Oregon treaty" forwarded to our minister—Mr. McLane—"not heretofore communicated to the Senate," including a statement of the propositions for the adjustment of the Oregon question previously made and rejected by the respective Governments. This statement was furnished to Mr. McLane before his departure from the country, and is dated on the 12th July, 1845, the day on which the note was addressed by the Secretary of State to Mr. Pakenham offering to settle the controversy by the forty-ninth parallel of latitude, which was rejected by that minister on the 29th July following.

The Senate will perceive that extracts from but two of Mr. McLane's "dispatches and communications to this Government" are transmitted, and these only because they were necessary to explain the answers given to them by the Secretary of State.

These dispatches are both numerous and voluminous, and from their confidential character their publication it is believed would be highly prejudicial to the public interests.

Public considerations alone have induced me to withhold the dispatches of Mr. McLane addressed to the Secretary of State. I concur with the Secretary of State in the views presented in his report herewith transmitted, against the publication of these dispatches.

Mr. McLane has performed his whole duty to his country, and I am not only willing, but anxious, that every Senator who may desire it shall have an opportunity of perusing these dispatches at the Department of State. The Secretary of State has been instructed to afford every facility for this purpose.

JAMES K. POLK.

But that was while the matter was pending between this Government and another great nation, when the premature publication might produce disastrous results.

In this case we are dealing with a small and insignificant country compared to ours, where the transaction, so far as the executive branch is concerned, is at an end; where there can be no document the publication of which would disturb the peace of the two countries. It is only the light we desire—all the information relating to a transaction that has passed from the hands of the President and has come to us.

Mr. LODGE. May I ask the Senator from Maryland a question?

Mr. GORMAN. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. Do I understand the Senator to say that when we ratify the treaty the matter is at an end?

Mr. GORMAN. I mean to say that so far as concerns the negotiations leading up to the point where the treaty has been completed by the executive branch and has been transmitted to us——

Mr. LODGE. The Senator, of course, is aware that the treaty is not completed.

Mr. GORMAN. I am aware of that, and it can not be completed until it has been acted upon by this body.

Mr. LODGE. I mean after it is acted upon by this body it is not complete.

Mr. GORMAN. And it ought not to be acted upon here until we have every single item of information that the President had when he negotiated it.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. GORMAN. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suppose Senators on the other side are desirous of obtaining information to be used in executive session in the consideration of the treaty?

Mr. GORMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. LODGE. And they desire information upon all matters pertaining to it?

Mr. GORMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALDRICH. And not upon negotiations of a difficult and delicate character, perhaps, which are now going on between some of these governments in regard to matters which have grown up since the treaty was negotiated. If that is their purpose, I suggest that an amendment or modification be made in the resolution, so that the correspondence called for shall be such as was exchanged prior to the negotiation of or has reference to the treaty now pending.

I think the Senator from Maryland himself would hardly feel like asking the President of the United States, who is charged with this work of carrying on diplomatic negotiations, to send here information in regard to what is now being done, if anything, as to matters between Colombia and the United States or between Panama and Colombia. I trust that that is not the purpose of this resolution.

Mr. GORMAN. I do not think the Senator from Rhode Island could put such a construction upon the resolution. Certainly it is not the intention.

I was not aware that other negotiations are pending. I hope, for the honor of the country, that they are, and that we may find some way out of it, so that every Senator, no matter whether on this or the other side, may feel and know that by sound judgment a wise public policy may be inaugurated which will bring back to us the good feeling of the people south of us on this continent. This is the first public intimation I have had that such a thought may have entered the minds of another branch of this Government.

No, Mr. President, I answer the Senator from Rhode Island frankly and say to him that if the President of the United States and his Secretary of State should say to the Senate of the United States in response to this resolution, as did President Polk to his great Secretary of State, there are communications in connection with this matter that ought not to be made public, but that Senators shall have every facility for informing themselves, we would all be content. It is due to him and due to his office, I beg Senators on the other side to understand perfectly, that while there is intense feeling it is not a feeling of hostility to the President of the United States himself, but there is intense feeling that this matter is beyond party lines, and while the motive, as stated by the President himself in his message, has been to advance civilization and commerce, the manner of doing it, the methods which have been employed, in the judgment of many of us put in jeopardy, if they do not entirely destroy, the work that has been begun for so many years and which has been followed by Republican as well as by Democratic statesmen.

It being the great purpose of our Government to promote commercial prosperity on honorable terms, in view of the great volume of trade that should come to us, greater from the states on the American continent than all that you are struggling for in the Orient, it is the wise policy of the Government to attach those people to us, not by the Monroe doctrine, by which we were to protect them from foreign power, but to bring them in the closest possible commercial relations. And hence we have had commissions and congresses, and there has been a railroad constructed down the backbone from the farthest limit of our northern possessions, to the end that that trade might be brought to us. Look at the trade we have gained because of the American money that has entered into the construction of internal improvements in Mexico which have brought that great nation closer to us, and thereby our prosperity has been greatly increased.

What we desire is a policy of fair and honorable dealing, a policy which will bring them to us instead of taking their trade to Germany. That country, systematically and with great force, by planting its people upon the territory south of us, and by the inauguration of lines of transportation and banking facilities, is absorbing the commerce which belongs to us and which our present course is driving away.

That is the motive which prompts us, when you treat it alone from the commercial standpoint; but more than that we feel seriously and earnestly that the method of doing it is a blot upon our diplomatic relations which will never be wiped out.

That is the idea which has suggested all these inquiries, and I beg the Senator in charge of the great Committee on Foreign Relations not to be so sensitive. The President's honor will be taken care of, and the President's rights are perfectly guarded. There is no disposition to reflect upon him by any inquiry.

But we are bound, Mr. President, to guard the perfect right of the Senate of the United States. You and I are a part of this treaty-making power. The claim that any fact connected with the transactions shall be suppressed from you and me ought not to have a single advocate for a moment in this body.

Look at the documents sent here by President McKinley in the Fifty-sixth Congress, at the second session, in relation to the treaty, in the negotiation of which you, Mr. President [Mr. FRYE in the chair], bore a conspicuous part as well as in its consideration here. Not a line in regard to that treaty, so far as is known, was kept from the Senate, and documents of the most confidential character were sent without hesitation. Asking the President for them by the Senate was not a reflection upon him. He was too well versed in the conduct of the affairs of the nation to hesitate for a moment. He knew, as the present President knows, that it was not unusual for this body to advise the President pending negotiations, and that a resolution or an intimation that a course should be pursued was always followed by the President.

In the treaty-making power this is the first time, I think, where a majority being with the President have hesitated to give the information. It is proper to assume that all that has been done is honorable, is fair, and would not reflect upon the honor of the Government from the view point of the Executive. Then why be so sensitive? Why hesitate about the passage of any one of these resolutions? Will you force the treaty through before you give the information to us? I scarcely think, Mr. President, that the most intense partisan, the Senator most anxious simply to ratify the acts at the other end of the Avenue, will go quite so far. No Senator on this floor can point to a single proposition in the shape of a resolution that is not proper in itself, in every letter of it, and if, when they have been offered, a suggestion has been made on the other side that the phraseology should be changed, as in the case of the resolution I offered, the suggestion was promptly accepted.

I insist there is nothing in this resolution that is not in conformity with precedent, and when we have followed so distinguished a statesman as Mr. Webster, surely my friend from Illinois can not object.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, this resolution is understood to represent "collective wisdom" of the other side.

Mr. GORMAN. "The best thought."

Mr. SPOONER. "The best thought" of the other side of the Senate. I do not adopt the suggestion made by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], that there could have been in its introduction in the open and legislative session of the Senate any ulterior purpose, because I know how absolutely guileless the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] and the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] are in all matters which could by any possibility even have a political aspect. I hope it will not be offensive, however, for me to say that after the speech of the Senator from Maryland I have a suspicion that this resolution, drawn as it was and introduced in legislative session, has already partly subserved the purpose which led to its introduction in this form.

Of course the Senators, I suppose, assumed that some one on this side of the Chamber would probably, as has been the custom, seek to insert in the resolution the amendment which has been moved by the Senator from Illinois, qualifying the resolution so as to leave it, as it would be probably without it, to the President to determine whether the public interest would be subserved by withholding any document or correspondence. From that might be derived the inference, not of course for any partisan purpose, I would not suggest that for the world, that the Republican Senators would not pass this resolution without putting into it a shelter behind which something which ought to be published was to be kept private.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin will suspend while the Chair lays before the Senate the Calendar of General Orders.

The SECRETARY. Order of Business No. 13, Senate bill 887.

Mr. LODGE. I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will be allowed to proceed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the Senator from Wisconsin may proceed.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the resolution may be considered as being before the Senate until it is disposed of.

Mr. CULLOM. Yes; let us get it out of the way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island asks unanimous consent that the resolution may proceed. Is there objection?

Mr. LODGE. Until disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Until disposed of.

Mr. ALDRICH. Until disposed of, making it the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from Maryland made a very eloquent protest in connection with the amendment proposed here and by way of argument against it. He said, "Why shall anything be concealed which the Senate and the public ought to have?" Does the Senator think that the purpose of concealment is necessarily or naturally involved in making the language of this resolution in harmony with the custom of the Senate? The other day a resolution was introduced here calling for certain papers, the report of a special agent of the Treasury Department, confidential in its nature. The Senate incorporated in it, "if, in the judgment of the President, not incompatible with the public interest."

Mr. GORMAN. There was a special reason.

Mr. SPOONER. There was a special reason because it was confidential, because papers like the reports of the secret-service agents and many other documents which are in the archives of the Government are in their nature confidential, and because it is obvious to everyone that it might be detrimental to the public interest that they should be given to the public.

I suggest to the Senator from Maryland that this area here [indicating the aisle] never has divided the members of the Senate on any lines of national honor or of Senatorial honor, and that there is no one in this Chamber who may properly arrogate to himself the claim that some of the Senate care more for national honor than others. We are all as sensitive upon that subject, I take it, without regard to party, as any member of this body can be. But all that will be discussed later.

Now, Mr. President, I protest that the better practice, notwithstanding the precedents which have been referred to—and diligent search has produced but few and most of them of long ago—is that resolutions relating to executive or confidential business should be introduced in executive session. Since I have been a member of this body that has been the rule, although now and then there has been a departure from it.

This resolution recognizes the fact that there may be in the documents called for, and doubtless will be, papers which should not, in the interest of the Government, be given to the world, because the Senate, acting in a legislative capacity, is asking the President of the United States to send to the Senate, acting in an entirely different capacity, certain papers in the confidence of the executive session.

I can easily conceive of a situation in which it would be impossible to argue in the open session properly in antagonism to the passage of such a resolution. The chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations might know that in a correspondence there were references to another government which, if given to the world, would be offensive. He could not so state in the open session.

There are many reasons, Mr. President, why the practice of recent years should be adhered to in confining executive business to the executive session of the Senate.

Now, I know of no papers which have not been sent to the Senate. If there is anything to be concealed about this business, I know nothing of it. I am speaking upon the theory that there is no scrap of paper which the President will not be willing to send to the Senate in executive session. But that is for him to determine.

The negotiation of treaties is a function conferred by the Constitution entirely upon the President. The Senate is not a participant in that function. He may negotiate treaties through such agencies as he may choose. It may be done through the minister or ambassador, or whoever it may be, resident at the court of the country with which the treaty is to be made. It may be done upon oral negotiation; it may be done by the Secretary of State here at home in conversation with the representative of a foreign power.

The President, in the very nature of things, in negotiating treaties of vital consequence to the country, must have the utmost liberty of frankness in the instructions, the arguments, the strategy which he desires the agent whose service he is employing to pursue; and I am not willing to admit that the Senate, even in executive session, may command the President to lay before it all the negotiations, the letters of instruction, the correspondence, the conversations, the motives which led to this move or that, to this argument or that, when the treaty is laid before the Senate for consideration.

I do not know how it may have been, but I assume that in the old days Senators to whom papers were sent in confidence or who listened in executive session to frank speech under the seal of secrecy always maintained inviolable the faith.

Mr. President, I see a resolution here introduced January 5, 1899, I think in legislative session, by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]:

Resolved, That the President of the United States, so far as in his judgment not inconsistent with the public interest, be requested to communicate to the Senate all instructions given by him to the commissioners for negotiating the pending treaty with Spain, and all correspondence between the Executive or the Department of State with such commissioners, and all reports made by them to him or to the Department.

I do not know whether the resolution was adopted or not.

Mr. LODGE. It was adopted.

Mr. SPOONER. I do remember that the correspondence, the protocols, were sent by the President to the Senate in executive session.

Mr. LODGE. And not printed.

Mr. SPOONER. No, not printed; but after the treaty had been ratified and when the time came to legislate as to certain phases of the matter, they were made public by the Senate.

Mr. BERRY. Not all of them, I think, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. SPOONER. I think the Senator is right.

Mr. BERRY. I think some of them were never made public.

Mr. SPOONER. I think the Senator may be right about it.

Mr. LODGE. Some of them were not made public.

Mr. SPOONER. Some of them were not made public. I remember now one item in that correspondence which it would not have been in the interest of this country to have made public, although entirely proper and wise to be used by this Government.

Now, Mr. President, our relation to the President in legislative session we all understand. He is not the servant of Congress. He is not the servant of the Senate. It is not for the Senate to direct him or command him except within certain lines of legislation, within his oath to see that the laws are faithfully executed; and although we are a part of the treaty-making power, he is still the head, under the Constitution, of a coordinate and independent branch of this Government. He is not subject to the command of the Senate in executive session.

It is perfectly proper for the President, in executive session or in responding to a resolution adopted in executive session, to declare that he withholds certain papers because in his judgment the public interest requires it. No one disputes that.

Mr. TILLMAN. Does the Senator mean in regard to treaties, too?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes, I mean in regard to treaties. I think it is true as to treaties especially.

Mr. TILLMAN. Does the Senator forget that two-thirds of the Senate can pass a law over his veto and make him obey it?

Mr. SPOONER. If I forgot that I ought to go home. I do not forget.

Mr. TILLMAN. But the Senator is arguing apparently, to my mind, an absurdity. We have as much power in our sphere as the President.

Mr. SPOONER. Ah! That is just what I say; no more.

Mr. TILLMAN. No more. But as one part of the treaty-making body he can not keep secret from the other part of it any of the facts connected with that treaty and then have them all equal.

Mr. SPOONER. He can.

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, of course, he can; but the Senate ought not to permit it.

Mr. SPOONER. Oh, we will debate that in executive session. I am talking about one thing, and the Senator is talking about another. He was talking about our legislative power to veto under the Constitution. That is an entirely different subject.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will pardon me, I though we were discussing the relative powers of the executive and legislative branches of the Government, we being a part of the latter.

The Senator seemed about to surrender to the Executive everything under certain circumstances; which is a contention I can not agree to at all.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator from Wisconsin permit me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. BERRY. If a treaty can only be made by the President and the Senate, and the President has possession of documents and papers bearing on the question as to whether that treaty ought to have been made or ought to be ratified, will the Senator say why the President ought not to send to the Senate, in executive session, every paper—I do not mean for publication—which bears on the question as to whether or not that treaty should or should not be ratified?

Mr. SPOONER. Who is to be the judge as to whether or not a paper or document bears on the question?

Mr. BERRY. The Senate, which calls for it, thinks that it does bear upon it. I do not know how we could make it more specific. We can make the request that the papers be furnished, and I can not see how it can be compatible with the public interest that the President should withhold from the Senate, in executive session, any matter that bears upon the question as to whether or not a treaty shall be ratified.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes, sir.

Mr. McLAURIN. I was just going to make the suggestion that he who has to pass upon the question would be the judge of whether the document and the evidence would be material and relevant to the question under consideration.

Mr. SPOONER. Oh, this question is an abstraction anyway. No President ever refused to send to the Senate, I take it, or ever will, when the Senate is considering a treaty, all information that would afford aid to the Senate in determining one way or another as to its action; and I say that the Senate in executive session, in my judgment, has no right to demand of the President, if it is, for any reason, against his judgment, every phase and chapter of the negotiations which led to the signing of the treaty; but we can take care of that later.

As to this resolution, I wish to say further—and I wish to hurry, because another Senator desires to be heard—I have myself no doubt that all the papers which the President has will come to the Senate. I have no doubt whatever of that. I am simply contending for a principle, for an attitude which I think should be maintained steadfastly by the Senate toward the head of a coordinate and independent branch of the Government.

But this resolution is broader than any argument made in support of it maintains. It is not simply a resolution calling upon the President to send to the Senate all correspondence which led to the negotiation of the treaty which is now pending before the Senate and which the Senate is called upon to ratify or reject, but it also calls upon the President to send to the Senate correspondence which the Senate did not call for when the treaty to which it refers was pending before the Senate and acted upon by the Senate. I refer to the correspondence which led up to the signing of the Hay-Herran treaty. We had almost unlimited debate upon that treaty. It was ratified by the Senate.

It did not occur to any Senator at that time that the President should be called upon, in order to enable the Senate to discharge intelligently its duty in acting upon that treaty, to lay before the Senate all the correspondence or any of the correspondence which pertained to the negotiation. That treaty is dead, Mr. President. It died at Bogota; and now the President is asked to send to the Senate correspondence which led to a treaty which has never become the law of the land——

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. SPOONER. And which Senators did not ask for, as I recollect, while that treaty was pending——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. SPOONER. In order that they may use it in acting upon another treaty made with a different government.

Now, I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CULBERSON. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the amendment to which he refers was put into the resolution in the form suggested by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM].

Mr. SPOONER. Very well; what change does that make? That simply relieves the President from sending to the Senate all the correspondence that ever existed in the history of this Government between this Government and Colombia in regard to a canal. That would call upon the President to send to the Senate in confidence the correspondence relating to the treaty of 1846 so far as it related to a canal, and it distinctly mentions a canal.

Mr. CULBERSON. I invite the Senator's attention now to the fact that any such construction as that was expressly disclaimed by the mover of the resolution.

Mr. SPOONER. I am not talking about the mental operation or the oral disclaimer of the Senator from Texas. I am talking about the resolution.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the pending treaty is made with the successor of Colombia, and that the President himself in his message has taken the position that whether we made a treaty in regard to the canal with New Granada, or Colombia, or Panama made no difference. It seems that the question of the honor of the Government is involved. I acknowledge that is as dear to the Senator from Wisconsin as it is to me or anyone else on this side. We are not the only guardians of the honor of the United States, and we do not claim to be.

But I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that this whole subject relates to a canal; that the question of the honesty or dishonesty, the honor or dishonor of this Government in relation to this canal transaction is under discussion, and that, therefore, any correspondence which relates to a canal or a treaty about a canal with either of these three entities—New Granada, Colombia, or Panama—might properly be brought in as a part of this document. Of course, nobody wants to go back to the treaty of 1846. We are dealing immediately with the two treaties, one of which has been rejected and one of which is now pending; the one negotiated with an actual government, and the other negotiated with—well, I suppose, the de facto government, though the question as to how it became so is under discussion.

I ask the Senator's attention in that phase of the subject as to whether or not his contention that the correspondence leading up to the Hay-Herran treaty is legitimately a part of the documents which might be considered in dealing with the successor of Colombia or the present status? That is rather a long question, but I imitate my friend sometimes in doing a little more than asking a question.

Mr. SPOONER. It is a long question, Mr. President, and, in my humble judgment, it has no more to do with the matter that I am immediately discussing than "the flowers that bloom in the spring." [Laughter.]

Mr. TILLMAN. I expected that.

Mr. SPOONER. But I am anxious to get through. I intend to vote, not only now, but always while I am a member of this body, no matter who is President—because it is in the interest of the country, and it is respectful and decent to any President—for the proposition or amendment which shall leave it to the discretion of the President to withhold any papers which, in his judgment, ought not to be made public.

I shall do it on principle; I shall do it because I think it is wise that it should be done; and I shall do it also in the full belief that in response to a resolution so worded there will not be a scrap of paper which refers to this subject or to the Hay-Herran treaty which will not be promptly communicated to the Senate by the President.

That is all I wish to say.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the famous message in which Washington refused to send papers relating to the Jay treaty to the House of Representatives, although they had been already furnished to the Senate, relates, as is well known, chiefly to the power of the House to demand such documents, which Washington absolutely denied. I do not think there is any case in which the demand for papers relating to a treaty has led to a dispute between the Executive and the Senate.

But, Mr. President, I think there is a distinction to be drawn, in the first place, between what we may lawfully ask for and what we can not lawfully ask for. I do not think, for example—although the case has been much contested in the past—that the Senate has any right to ask the President to give his reasons for removing an officer from the public service. I think that is clearly beyond the right of the Senate.

I do not consider that the Senate—to take another example—has any right to ask the President to submit to it the credentials which led him to receive a foreign minister or an ambassador, because the right of receiving a foreign minister or an ambassador is vested in the President exclusively by the Constitution. On the other hand, I think the Senate may lawfully call for papers which will cast light upon an appointment to office, and I think the Senate may lawfully call, on the same principle, for any papers relating to a treaty. But the fact that we may lawfully call for papers does not deprive the President of the right to withhold papers in either case, if he thinks it is for the best public interest.

Andrew Jackson stated this distinction, I think, very well in 1835. The Senate sent a resolution asking for certain papers in regard to the removal of Gideon Fitz, late surveyor-general south of the State of Tennessee. The President said:

This is another of those calls for information made upon me by the Senate which have, in my judgment, either related to the subjects exclusively belonging to the executive department, or otherwise encroached on the constitutional powers of the Executive. Without conceding the right of the Senate to make either of these requests, I have yet, for the various reasons heretofore assigned in my several replies, deemed it expedient to comply with several of them. It is now, however, my solemn conviction that I ought no longer, from any motive nor in any degree, to yield to these unconstitutional demands. Their continued repetition imposes on me as the representative and trustee of the American people the painful but imperious duty of resisting to the utmost any further encroachment on the rights of the Executive.

Then at the end he says:

I therefore decline a compliance with so much of the resolution of the Senate as requests "copies of the charges, if any," in relation to Mr. Fitz, and in doing so must be distinctly understood as neither affirming nor denying that any such charges were made; but as the Senate may lawfully call upon the President for information properly appertaining to nominations submitted to them, I have the honor, in this respect, to reply that I have none to give them in the case of the person nominated as successor to Mr. Fitz.

Drawing the distinction which I have attempted to make.

Mr. ALDRICH. Would it interrupt the Senator if I should read from another Democratic authority, if the Senator is through quoting from Jackson?

Mr. LODGE. I was going to read further from Jackson.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is another Democratic authority from which I should like to read.

Mr. LODGE. I was going to show how he interpreted the right of the Senate to call for papers relating to an appointment. In 1834 he was asked for his reasons for appointing certain gentlemen directors of the Bank of the United States. He said:

I disclaim all pretension of right on the part of the President officially to inquire into or call in question the reasons of the Senate for rejecting any nomination whatsoever. As the President is not responsible to them for the reasons which induce him to make a nomination, so they are not responsible to him for the reasons which induce them to reject it. In these respects each is independent of the other and both responsible to their respective constituents. Nevertheless the attitude in which certain vital interests of the country are placed by the rejection of the gentlemen now renominated require of me frankly to communicate my views of the consequences which must necessarily follow this act of the Senate if it be not reconsidered.

Then, on June 13, 1834, he was asked for a paper relating to the nomination—not to the removal, but to the nomination—of the minister to Great Britain; and it is very interesting to see how he interpreted his powers in a case of that kind, where he admitted that the Senate might lawfully call for papers. He said:

I have this day received a resolution of the 12th instant requesting me to communicate to the Senate a copy of the first official communication which was made to Andrew Stevenson of the intention of the President to nominate him as a minister plenipotentiary and envoy extraordinary to the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and his answer thereto.

As a compliance with this resolution might be deemed an admission of the right of the Senate to call upon the President for confidential correspondence of this description, I consider it proper on this occasion to remark that I do not acknowledge such a right.

From these extracts it will be seen that the opinions of President Jackson were very definite, and that not only where he thought the Senate could not lawfully call for papers, but where he thought they had a lawful right to demand them, in both cases he was quite ready to refuse them. I now yield to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator. I have just a word more to say.

Mr. ALDRICH. If it will not interrupt the Senator——

Mr. LODGE. It does not interrupt me at all.

Mr. ALDRICH. I should like to read a statement made by another Democratic authority, whose party standing is perhaps more or less in doubt. I will read an extract from a message of President Cleveland, sent to the Senate in March, 1886. He said:

The requests and demands which by the score have for nearly three months been presented to the different departments of the Government, whatever may be their form, have but one complexion. They assume the right of the Senate to sit in judgment upon the exercise of my exclusive discretion and Executive function, for which I am solely responsible to the people from whom I have so lately received the sacred trust of office. My oath to support and defend the Constitution, my duty to the people who have chosen me to execute the powers of their great office and not to relinquish them, and my duty to the Chief Magistracy, which I must preserve unimpaired in all its dignity and vigor, compel me to refuse compliance with these demands.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I think the statement just read by the Senator from Rhode Island sustains the view of President Jackson.

I only want to say a single word more in conclusion about this matter. This is a case where we can lawfully call for certain papers, and the President can as lawfully, in my judgment, withhold them if he thinks it is for the public interest that he should do so. It is proposed in this resolution to adopt the language of command. I do not think it is ever a good thing to adopt the language of command unless you can enforce your command, and there is no power that can enable us to enforce our command against any President of the United States in a case like this. Even if we were to pass it unanimously, we should be quite helpless unless the House of Representatives happened to agree with us.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that to indulge in the language of command, which I do not think we have any right to indulge in, legally speaking, and at the same time to indulge in a wanton discourtesy, which the almost uniform practice of this body utterly discountenances, would be a very great and grave mistake.

Mr. President, I have no doubt that this resolution is wholly destitute of any party significance, because the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] has told us so. The only thing that made me suspect for a moment that the resolution could have any political object was the extreme nobility and purity of the motives which the Senator set forward. They seemed to me almost superhuman, they were so lofty and so good.

I only wish to say further that, inasmuch as the Senator from Maryland referred to our being sensitive about all these resolutions, there is not one of them which this side would not be delighted to vote upon at any moment. We should be very glad to dispose of them all at the earliest possible day. Our only source of complaint in this whole matter is that we are not allowed to vote on anything, not even on these resolutions. If we could be permitted to vote on them, they at least could be disposed of.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I am not especially concerned about this resolution or the particular action which may be taken under it by the President, because I feel quite sure, from the statements which have been made by Senators, that a full response is going to be made by the President whatever may be the language of the resolution. But, Mr. President, the positions taken by honorable Senators here to-day upon the question which is involved make this a very important matter, and I am unwilling, under the statements which have been made by Senators as to their views of the rights of the President and the rights of the Senate, that the occasion should pass without my putting upon record, not simply what I may think upon it, but what has heretofore been uttered in this Chamber by learned and distinguished Senators, the weight of whose opinion I am sure will not be disregarded by those of us who now occupy places which they then so greatly honored and distinguished.

I am the more induced not to permit this occasion to pass from the fact that on yesterday we had a reply from the executive department, in response to a resolution sent by the Senate directing one of the officers of one of the Departments to communicate certain information to this Senate, and in that reply, sent by the President of the United States, we were shortly informed that, in his opinion, it was not compatible with the public interest that the Senate of the United States should have the information which was sought.

The debate which has been had here to-day raises clearly this issue: Is it within the province of the President of the United States in his discretion, his sole judgment, to communicate to Congress what may be desired of information within any of the Departments, or equally within his discretion and at his will to withhold the same? That it is thus within the powers of the President is the bold avowal, as I understand it, of Senators on the other side of the Chamber.

It has just been reiterated by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and previously stated by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] and other Senators that while it was within the power of the Senate and the province of the Senate to call for any information which it might desire it was equally within the power and the province of the President of the United States, in his judgment, to say that it was not compatible with the public interest that the Senate should have the information. That, the Senate will note, brings clearly the point in issue, which is this: While it is the right of the Senate to make the request, in whose judgment shall rest the determination of the question whether or not the information desired shall be communicated to the Senate? Shall it rest in the judgment of the President or shall it rest in the judgment of the Senate? That is the clear-cut question. The Senator from Wisconsin smiles, because I know his mind runs back to what I am now about to cite to the Senate.

Mr. President, there was once a great debate in this Senate on that question, and I think that when we come to sift it there could be no more serious question propounded to the Senate of the United States than that, because in its determination may rest, and would rest, questions of the gravest import; and if determined in favor of the right of the President to withhold at his discretion, the consequences which would flow from such a determination and from action thereunder it is difficult to overestimate. The question is fundamental in its nature and scope.

I felicitate myself and the country that in that great debate—for it was a great debate, a debate participated in by Senators whose superiors, considered collectively, never sat in this Chamber since the foundation of the Government—I felicitate myself and the country upon the fact that in that great debate the Republican Senators took the position, and maintained it, that it was a matter for the determination of the Senate as to the information which it required, and that the President had no right to reply that he was the judge of that question.

Senators have read here to-day utterances of Democratic Presidents. I pin my faith to the utterance of no man when it is in derogation of the rights and the prerogatives of the Senate, be he of my party or against it. I am free to say two things—that I utterly disapprove of the contention of the Democratic Presidents whose utterances have been read here, who assumed to themselves the right to determine whether certain information should be given to the Senate upon its demand; and the other thing, which I am more than glad to say, is that in that great debate, in which the Republicans were upon one side in this Chamber and the Democrats upon the other side—not only do I concede it now, but I have conceded it heretofore in reference to this debate—the Republicans were in my opinion right and the Democrats were wrong as to the question of constitutional power.

It was a very narrow line of division between Democratic and Republican Senators in that debate. Upon both sides it was conceded that wherever the matter out of which the call proceeded rested confessedly within the jurisdiction of the Senate the Senate had the right to call for the papers and for themselves to determine whether or not they should be called for. On the side of the Republicans it was contended that when the question was in dispute whether or not the subject-matter was within the jurisdiction of the Senate it was then a question for the determination of the Senate. The Democrats, on the other hand, contended that in that case it was for the Executive to say whether or not it was within the jurisdiction of the Senate or without their jurisdiction.

That was the narrow line of division, and I am frank to say—and I have said so heretofore in the Senate—that the Republicans were then right in their contention. They went to the utmost limit, Mr. President, in the assertion of the power of the Senate not only to call for whatever was within the jurisdiction of the Senate, but to determine what was the jurisdiction of the Senate, and to deny to the President the right to assume that a certain demand was as to a matter outside the jurisdiction of the Senate.

Now, in passing I will call the attention of the learned Senator from Wisconsin to the fact, in view of his suggestion that questions of this kind should always originate in resolutions adopted or offered, if you please, in executive session, that the resolution out of which that great debate grew was one which related to executive business, and that it was offered in open session by the Judiciary Committee, then a Republican committee, headed by the Hon. George F. Edmunds. And that distinguished committee on the Republican side was composed of these Members: George F. Edmunds, John J. Ingalls, S. J. R. McMillan, GEORGE F. HOAR, James F. Wilson, and William M. Evarts.

Am I justified, after reading that list of names, in the statement which I made that there were men then here whose superiors collectively considered never sat in this Chamber?

Mr. ALDRICH. Who signed the minority report?

Mr. BACON. I have not the minority report before me, but I can state it pretty well from memory—Mr. Pugh, of Alabama; Mr. Vest, of Missouri, and two others whose names I do not now recall.

Mr. SPOONER. George, of Mississippi.

Mr. BACON. Yes; George, of Mississippi, if you please. I think he was undoubtedly one of them. Their names are not here.

This document which I hold in my hand contains the report of the majority. There was a minority report filed. But I want to call the attention of Senators to the fact that even as to the minority there was no possible dispute or contention denying to the Senate the right to call peremptorily for anything which related to a matter within the jurisdiction of the Senate, and, even according to their contention, this report now called for would be a legitimate call, and one not vested in the discretion of the President to refuse to furnish, because it relates to a treaty, which is a matter distinctly within the jurisdiction of the Senate.

In that particular case Senators, some of whom are now here and who were then here, will remember that the issue grew out of the fact that the President of the United States sent in a certain nomination for appointment to an office, and the question was raised as to whether or not there was legitimately a vacancy, in the fact that the President had removed the party who had theretofore held the office, and the Senate wanted to know the cause for which he had removed him. That was the contention upon which the debate rose.

Mr. SPOONER. That whole debate was predicated largely on the tenure-of-office act.

Mr. BACON. I understand that; there is no doubt about that fact. But that fact in no manner affected the merits of the question of constitutional power which was involved between the President and the Senate.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me to call his attention to a fact?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. The pending resolution has no reference whatever in terms to the pending treaty.

Mr. BACON. Well.

Mr. ALDRICH. The resolution does not ask for any correspondence or notes relative to the treaty in any form.

Mr. BACON. I will not stop to discuss that, because, as I stated in the beginning, my purpose in rising is not so much as to any particular interest in this particular resolution, but because of the position taken by Senators here, which I am unwilling shall pass unchallenged; and I wish to challenge it, not upon the strength of my convictions or my arguments, but upon the most elaborate and learned arguments that were made here by Republican Senators, then members of this body.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me to ask him a question for information, not for debate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DEPEW in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Do I understand the Senator is contending that in no case the President is to be the judge of what information he or the executive department of the Government will send to either House?

Mr. BACON. If the learned Senator will allow me to pretermit an immediate answer to that question, I will endeavor, before I conclude, to answer the Senator in his own language which he has uttered in this Chamber. That will be the most satisfactory reply, I presume, that I can make to him.

Mr. SPOONER. I would rather have your opinion than my own.

Mr. BACON. I will endeavor to express it before I get through, if my physical condition permits.

There was sent to the Senate on that occasion a most elaborate report, signed by all the Republican members of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, whose names I have already read to the Senate, headed by the Hon. George F. Edmunds, as chairman. The report is too long to be read now, but I will ask, if I may be excused, because I am not in the most robust physical condition at present, the Secretary to read on pages 4 and 5 where it is marked in this report. I will say to the Senate that it is Senate Report 135, Forty-ninth Congress, first session. I would prefer to read it myself, but under the circumstances I will ask the Secretary to read it. I hope it may have the attention of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

The important question, then, is whether it is within the constitutional competence of either House of Congress to have access to the official papers and documents in the various public offices of the United States created by laws enacted by themselves. It may be fully admitted that except in respect of the Department of the Treasury there is no statute which commands the head of any Department to transmit to either House of Congress on its demand any information whatever concerning the administration of his Department, but the committee believes it to be clear that from the very nature of the powers intrusted by the Constitution to the two Houses of Congress it is a necessary incident that either House must have at all times the right to know all that officially exists or takes place in any of the Departments of the Government.

So perfectly was this proposition understood before and at the time of the formation of the Constitution that the Continental Congress, before the adoption of the present Constitution, in establishing a department of foreign affairs and providing for a principal officer thereof, thought it fit to enact that all books, records, and other papers in that office should be open to the inspection of any Member of Congress, provided that no copy should be taken of matters of secret nature without special leave of Congress. It was not thought necessary to enact that the Congress itself should be entitled to the production and inspection of such papers, for that right was supposed to exist in the very nature of things, and when, under the Constitution, the department came to be created, although the provision that each individual Member of Congress should have access to the papers was omitted (evidently for reasons that can now be quite well understood), it was not thought necessary that an affirmative provision should be inserted, giving to the Houses of Congress the right to know the contents of the public papers and records in the public offices of the country whose laws and whose offices they were to assist in creating.

It is believed that there is no instance of civilized governments having bodies representative of the people or of States in which the right and the power of those representative bodies to obtain in one form or another complete information as to every paper and transaction in any of the executive departments thereof does not exist, even though such papers might relate to what is ordinarily an executive function, if that function impinged upon any duty of function of the representative bodies.

A qualification of this general right may under our Constitution exist in case of calls by the House of Representatives for papers relating to treaties, etc., under consideration and not yet disposed of by the President and Senate.

The committee feels authorized to state, after a somewhat careful research, that within the foregoing limits there is scarcely in the history of this Government until now any instance of a refusal by a head of a Department, or even of the President himself, to communicate official facts and information, as distinguished from private and unofficial papers, motions, views, reasons, and opinions, to either House of Congress when unconditionally demanded. Indeed, the early journals of the Senate show great numbers of instances of directions to the heads of Departments, as of course, to furnish papers and reports upon all sorts of affairs, both legislative and executive.

The instances of requests to the President and commands to the heads of Departments by each House of Congress from those days until now for papers and information on every conceivable subject of public affairs are almost innumerable, for it appears to have been thought by all the Presidents who have carried on the Government now for almost a century that, even in respect of requests to them, an independent and coordinate branch of the Government, they were under a constitutional duty and obligation to furnish to either House the papers called for, unless, as has happened in very rare instances, when the request was coupled with an appeal to the discretion of the President in respect of the danger of publicity, to send the papers if, in his judgment, it should not be incompatible with the public welfare.

Even in times of the highest party excitement and stress, as in 1826 and 1844, it did not seem to occur to the Chief Executive of the United States that it was possible that any official facts or information existing, either in the Departments created by law or within its own possession, could, save as before stated, be withheld from either of the Houses of Congress, although such facts or information sometimes involved very intricate and delicate matters of foreign affairs as well as sometimes the history and conduct of officers connected with the administration of affairs.

Mr. BACON. That is as strong a statement, I think, as could be made upon the question, and I desire to repeat in this connection, as Senators have asked who were the Senators who signed the minority report, evidently thereby intending to place in opposition to the utterances in this report the opinions of such eminent men as George, and Pugh, and Vest, and others whose names I do not now recall——

Mr. MITCHELL. I will give the Senators the names.

Mr. BACON. Very well.

Mr. MITCHELL. James L. Pugh, Richard Coke, George G. Vest, and Howell E. Jackson.

Mr. BACON. Yes; Jackson, afterwards judge of the Supreme Court.

Mr. MITCHELL. Afterwards judge of the Supreme Court.

Mr. BACON. As their names are invoked, I repeat the statement, amply verified by inspection of their report, that they most fully and completely recognize the right of the Senate to call for any paper or document, peremptorily and not within the discretion of the President to refuse, which related to a matter within the jurisdiction of the Senate. The only question made between the minority report and the majority report was whether or not the discretion was in the President to say that it was not in the jurisdiction of the Senate, or whether the Senate must determine for itself whether it was in the jurisdiction of the Senate.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from Indiana pardon me for a moment?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. The Republicans contended that the question as to whether or not a matter was within the jurisdiction of the Senate was for the determination of the Senate. The Democrats contended, on the other hand, that the question whether the matter was within the jurisdiction of the Senate or without the jurisdiction of the Senate was a matter for the determination of the President. That was the narrow line of division between them, and I will read, when I reply to whatever the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] may desire to say, from the minority report to that effect.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The close of the extract which the Senator just had read I understood incorporated the provision concerning compatibility with the public interest. Do I understand the Senator to say that that committee's report supported the proposition that the Senate had the right, as of right, to ask for any papers, whether or no the sending of them was compatible with the public interest?

Mr. BACON. Yes, sir; I do. I mean to say this: That in the report and the debate from which I am going to read—and I am glad the Senator will be present to hear it read——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will, if I can be.

Mr. BACON. The position is distinctly taken that the question as to whether or not it is a matter proper for Congress to ask for or for the Senate to ask for is a matter for the Senate to determine, and not a matter for the President.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Would it interrupt the course of the Senator's argument if at this particular point I suggested a question or two? If so, I will defer them.

Mr. BACON. I will endeavor to answer them now, unless I am going to answer them in the course of my argument. I will hear the question, however.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will ask the Senator whether it is his opinion that the President ought in any case to send papers to the Senate the sending of which is not compatible with the public interest?

Mr. BACON. The reply which I will make now, although I intended to advert to it later, is this: It is not to be assumed that the Senate of the United States, whenever its attention is called, with proper reasons given, in response to an inquiry, that there would be objection to the communication, would insist upon it. But to recognize the proposition that the President must determine it and simply end the matter by the reply that it is incompatible with the public interest to communicate the desired information is to yield the whole question and give the whole power to the President.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. And, if the Senator will permit me, the debate from which I am going to read is one in which that was the distinct proposition negatived by George F. Edmunds, GEORGE F. HOAR, William M. Evarts, Mr. Logan, the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin now present, and others.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I shall not ask the Senator any further questions, because I want to listen to his argument, but I call his attention now, so that perhaps he may elucidate the point, to this fact: The proposition he has now arrived at and the dilemma into which it seems to me the Senator is drifting is that it is a question for the Senate to judge and not for the President to judge whether or not papers asked for are compatible with the public interest, and if that proposition be admitted it sends all papers of every kind to the Senate.

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. And therefore destroys in advance the question of their compatibility or incompatibility with the public interest.

Mr. BACON. Absolutely.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Then the question does not exist.

Mr. BACON. In other words, the power is in the Senate to see any paper which it may determine it should see, if it relates to a matter which——

Mr. BEVERIDGE rose.

Mr. BACON. The Senator will pardon me.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes.

Mr. BACON. If it relates to a matter of which the Senate has properly jurisdiction. The practical operation of it is not that there shall be any exposure of papers which the public interest might not justify the exposure of, but that in a proper way the matter will be brought to its attention, and the assumption being that when reasons are given to the Senate it will not insist upon it. But the President himself can not shut the door to any Department and say that the Senate, or the House either, shall not have access to any paper which relates to a governmental matter.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me, I stated in the beginning that I was going to base the contention I made here not upon what I personally would say, but upon the elaborate arguments in a previous debate. I can only read a part of them, and I commend to the Senator the careful reading of the entire debate, because it is a most able and instructive one by men among the ablest who ever sat in this Chamber. Therefore I proceed with the reading of what learned Senators on that occasion said in this Chamber.

I will begin with what my learned and distinguished friend, the Senator from Wisconsin, said on that occasion, because he bore no insignificant part in that debate among the Titans, and there is no word uttered by the learned and distinguished Senator in that debate which he should wish to retract and no word uttered by him of which he should not now be proud; and, I will say further, no word uttered by him—I am speaking now as to arguments; I do not mean as to any personal references which may have been indulged in—of which I do not personally approve and to which approval I have not heretofore given utterance in this Chamber when a similar question was under debate.

Mr. President, in the beginning I desire, in order that what the Senator has said to-day semifacetiously as to the ingenuousness and candor of Senators on this side of the Chamber, may be recognized as having been uttered by him in the utmost seriousness, to ask that we may be accorded on this occasion the same credit for sincerity which he claimed for himself upon that occasion. That was a time when there was a Democrat in the White House and when there was a Republican majority in this Chamber, and in the outset the learned and distinguished Senator from Wisconsin used the language I will quote from the seventeenth volume of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, part 3, Forty-ninth Congress, first session, page 2487. The Senator from Wisconsin said——

Mr. TILLMAN. The present Senator from Wisconsin—the sitting Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BACON. The present very learned, able, and distinguished Senator whom we all so delight to honor; and as we admire and delight to honor both of the Senators from Wisconsin, I will say the senior Senator from Wisconsin. He began his speech in this way:

I make no attempt to disguise the fact, or to apologize for it, that the fortunes of the Republican party are very dear to me and that I wish that party, here and elsewhere, to reap every fair partisan advantage which may be taken from the blunders and from the shortcomings, if any such there are or shall be, of this Administration. But I trust I do not forget, and shall not forget, that I am a Senator of the United States as well as a Republican, and that as a Senator my first duty always is to the people, and that I have no right to take action here to subserve a party interest which would be harmful to the interests of the people.

Therefore the very learned and able argument of the distinguished Senator upon that occasion is not in any manner to be imputed to him as one influenced by a desire for partisan advantage, but as an argument delivered by him then, as now, recognized as one of the foremost constitutional lawyers of the United States, and therefore, delivered under such circumstances, the more entitled to consideration and approval by those who now have occasion to advert to it. The particular thing I had in mind in reading that is to ask that we also in the present debate may be acquitted of partisan purposes.

The Senator from Wisconsin proceeded to say:

I deny for myself, and I have authority to deny for every Senator upon this side of the Chamber, the statement so often made on the other side that we desire, or are willing, to harass, hamper, or embarrass the President in the proper exercise of Executive functions.

Will Senators accord to us at this time such equality of sincerity of purpose as that which was then claimed for himself by the honorable and distinguished Senator from Wisconsin?

Such a motive would be unworthy and should not be so lightly imputed.

I commend the language to the Senators on the other side, not to the Senator from Wisconsin, because he has not imputed, in so far as I have heard, but others have.

The principle involved in this controversy—

And it is this principle and the gradual recognition of the gravity of it that cause me to address the Senate at this time—

The principle involved in this controversy to my mind is far above the question as to who shall hold the offices in the country.

Mr. President, with that very high platform erected by the Senator and with himself thus voluntarily placed upon it, he addressed himself to the argument of this great constitutional question, because while it may seem to be a comparatively slight matter, so far as the pending resolution is concerned, it is a great constitutional question whether or not any officer of the Government, be he President or a subordinate, has a right to shut the doors in the face of Congress as to any information desired by it in the discharge of its duties. In the practical workings of the departments of this Government and in the proper and efficient performance of duties by Congress and in the exercise of the legitimate powers of Congress there can be no greater constitutional question than that; and once conceded as a power belonging to the Executive, there is no limitation to the extent to which that power can be carried and exercised.

Now, the Senator from Wisconsin knows I can not read the whole of his speech. I wish I could. I will say that it would not be necessary that I should myself say another word if I could, in support of my contention, read the whole of it. In the course of it he uses this language:

Look at the bald case as it stands before the Senate and before the people, unaided by the message which the President sent upon the same subject and which is in some sense an additional statement of fact. The Senate calls for certain papers, filed within a given period in a public department, touching the management of a public office. An executive officer of the United States, recognizing the fact that the papers are in his custody, not denying for a moment their existence, says to the Senate, by direction of the President, that "it is not considered that the public interest will be promoted by a compliance with said resolution and the transmission of the papers and documents therein mentioned to the Senate in executive session."

Mr. President, I will suspend the reading parts of the Senator's speech for a moment for the purpose of reading the resolution which was reported by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, and also reading the reply which was sent by the executive department to the Senate, in order that the Senate may have distinctly the issue before it which was made. On January 25, 1886, the Judiciary Committee reported to the Senate the following resolution for its adoption. Now, here is the resolution:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General of the United States be, and he hereby is, directed to transmit to the Senate copies of all documents and papers that have been filed in the Department of Justice since the 1st day of January, A. D. 1885—in relation to the management and conduct of the office of district attorney of the United States of the southern district of Alabama.

That being called for because of the fact that the President had sent in the name as a nominee to fill an office and had removed the district attorney, and the Senate desired to know whether or not he had removed him for good cause before they would proceed to the consideration of the nomination. Therefore they called for all the papers which had been there for a year before the occurrence, and on the following day that resolution was adopted, to wit, on the 26th day of January. On the 1st day of February thereafter the Senate received the following communication in response thereto:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
January 28, 1886.

It seems that was the date of the communication, and the document was received here on the 1st day of February.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
January 28, 1886.

The President pro tempore of the Senate of the United States:

I acknowledge the receipt of a resolution of the Senate adopted on the 25th instant in executive session, as follows:

"Resolved, That the Attorney-General of the United States be, and he hereby is, directed to transmit to the Senate copies of all documents and papers that have been filed in the Department of Justice since the 1st day of January, A. D. 1885, in relation to the management and conduct of the office of district attorney of the United States of the southern district of Alabama."

It thus quotes the resolution and then proceeds:

In response to the said resolution the President of the United States—

This is not the reply of the Attorney-General. He is speaking for the President of the United States—

In response to the said resolution the President of the United States directs me to say that the papers which were in this Department relating to the fitness of John D. Burnett, recently nominated to said office, having been already sent to the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, and the papers and documents which are mentioned in the said resolution, and still remaining in the custody of this Department, having exclusive reference to the suspension by the President of George M. Duskin, the late incumbent of the office of district attorney of the United States for the southern district of Alabama, it is not considered that the public interest will be promoted by a compliance with said resolution and the transmission of the papers and documents therein mentioned to the Senate in executive session.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. H. GARLAND,
Attorney-General.

Now, Mr. President, there was the square issue made, not by the Attorney-General but by the President of the United States, that in his judgment the public interest would not be promoted by having the Attorney-General comply with the resolution. In other words, the President of the United States assumed to judge, and did judge, that it was not incumbent upon him to comply with the demand of the Senate, and the square issue made by the majority of the Senate, in which I say now and I have said heretofore I think they were right, was this: Shall the President have a right to judge whether or not it is to the public interest that the Senate shall have the papers, or shall the Senate judge, and shall the President have the right under that judgment, if exercised by him, to close the door of the Department of Justice or of any other Department and say to the Senate, "In my judgment you have no right to enter and to know what is here?"

Mr. President, I am tempted to proceed with that line of argument, but I will not, because I started to read the argument of the Senator from Wisconsin, which is far superior to anything I can say. I repeat the last sentence which I read in order to have the connection of the Senator's speech:

An executive officer—

This is the speech of the Senator from Wisconsin from which I read—

An executive officer of the United States, recognizing the fact that the papers are in his custody, not denying for a moment their existence, says to the Senate, by direction of the President, that "it is not considered that the public interest will be promoted by a compliance with said resolution and the transmission of the papers and documents therein mentioned to the Senate in executive session."

Quoting the reply. Then the Senator proceeds:

Is it to be admitted that a Cabinet officer, even by direction of the President, shall be at liberty to refuse to transmit any papers to the Senate in executive session unless satisfied that the purpose for which the Senate desires them is one which in his opinion is wise and proper? Is it to be assumed by an executive officer or by the President that because a nomination is pending in the Senate of a person to fill an office that the Senate may not in executive session lawfully call for the papers filed in a Department touching the conduct of that office?

If Burnett had been confirmed and Duskin had been thereby removed, could the Senate be denied the production of the papers mentioned in the resolution? Even though called for in executive session, who will so contend? Does the fact that the nomination was pending change the character of the papers or the Senate's power to demand and its right to receive and inspect them?

If George M. Duskin were still in office, discharging the duties and functions of the position, and the Senate in open session or in executive session should pass this resolution calling for those papers, would the Attorney-General or would the President hesitate for one moment to transmit them? Suppose the House of Representatives had passed the resolution instead of the Senate, upon what theory could the Attorney-General, either of his own motion or upon the direction of the President, refuse to transmit them?

It has always been supposed that either the House of Representatives or the Senate had plenary power to investigate the Departments, had abundant authority to examine the Cabinet officers, even to bring them before the committee, with all papers in the office which would tend to show its condition, and the manner in which it had been conducted. It may be done in order to expose corruption; it may be done in order to uncover defects in the organization of a Department; it may be done in order that Congress obtain the information essential to the application of a corrective by new legislation. Such power in great fullness must of necessity exist, to be exercised under varied conditions and circumstances and with many different purposes.

Is this not the attitude? The President, not denying that there may be circumstances under which either the House or the Senate would be entitled to such papers, to demand them and compel their production, assumes that they are wanted for a purpose which in his judgment is not within the jurisdiction of the Senate.

The Senate will mark that the Senator comes directly to the issue as to whether or not the President has the right to assume that.

If for any purpose within the power of the Senate it can direct under any circumstances the Attorney-General, or any other Cabinet officer, to transmit to the Senate papers touching the conduct of a particular office, then it is essential to the orderly conduct of the Government that the executive officer should assume that the papers are desired for a legitimate purpose. Or has it come to this, that the Senate or the House demanding the production of papers, which either may rightfully demand for some purpose, must go with Eastern salaam to the Department door, bound to disclose, first, to the Attorney-General or the President, the precise purpose for which the papers are desired, under penalty of not receiving them at all?

How would it look, in response to a resolution adopted by the Senate asking that the Attorney-General or the Secretary of the Interior transmit to the Senate papers like these, in their very nature official, relating to the transaction of the public business, for the President to transmit to the Senate a message of this nature: "If you desire these papers you must first indicate to me the purpose for which you desire them, and if after having disclosed that purpose I think they are within your jurisdiction, and that the purpose to be subserved is a legitimate purpose, I shall transmit them; otherwise not?"

The Senator asks how it would do for the President to transmit such a message as that, and he continues:

Would that be in effect any different from this response of the Attorney-General? Would it not be humiliating? Would it be anything less than a one-man government? Would it do anything less than enable the President of the United States to shut out at his will the sunlight of investigation from all the public offices? Must the Senate, must the House—because if he may require the performance of that precedent condition of the Senate he may of the House—first advise him of the purpose and submit to his judgment as to whether it is a legitimate one?

The resolution interprets itself, and relates upon its face to papers which no man can deny are in their nature public. The President by a message, as to the propriety of which I have nothing to say, tells us, not that there are no such papers on the files, but that there were other papers filed during that period which he considers private and confidential papers.

I shall spend little time in discussing the question in the abstract as to what constitute private and confidential papers in distinction from public papers to which the Senate or House has the right of inspection. I concede, of course, that there may be addressed to the President, and doubtless are, many papers which are confidential.

No one questions that; but I deny that papers addressed to a head of a Department or to the President of the United States touching the conduct of an officer of such a character that they may be properly acted upon by either the head of the Department or the President, proper to be placed on the files of the Department, relating to the transaction of the people's business in one of the people's offices, can by any magic become the private and confidential and secret papers of the President himself.

Now, Mr. President, it is true that there the distinct question was as to whether Congress or the Senate should judge whether its motive was a legitimate one or whether the President should judge whether it was a legitimate one. But it matters not as to what question is raised, under the argument and under the reasoning of the argument, whenever there is any objection on the part of the President as to the disclosure of information which is desired, the question is one to be determined by the Senate and not by the President, because if the President can in the one case say, "In my opinion you have no right to have this information," he can say it in all cases, and it is within the power of the President of the United States, in his discretion and for any reason deemed by him to be sufficient, to absolutely shut up and hermetically seal every door of every Department of the Government.

The Senator continues, and I am sorry to have to omit any of it, because it is all strong and directly to the point. On the same page from which I last read—and I call the attention of my learned friend——

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator kindly give me the page?

Mr. BACON. Yes, sir; I have given it already, and I will give it again. Page 2488, March 18, 1886. The Senator said as the conclusion of that branch of his argument:

I assert now the proposition that the Senate has a right to obtain of a Cabinet officer upon demand, and of the President upon request, such information to enable it to act intelligently upon the question as to whether it will advise and consent to a proposed removal.

And yet it is sought to differentiate such a power from the other power of the Senate as to whether or not it has, in the language of the learned Senator, the right to obtain from the President, upon request, information to enable it to act intelligently upon the question as to whether or not it would advise and consent to the ratification of a treaty. If he can differentiate as to the two it will be but another evidence of the versatility and ability of the distinguished Senator.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield?

Mr. BACON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. TILLMAN. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Georgia that the history which he has been reading is so interesting that it recalls the old fable about the bull and the ox.

Mr. BACON. I will say to the Senator that I have had that in mind, but not being a happy raconteur I did not venture upon its narration. I will allow him to go ahead.

Mr. TILLMAN. It appears to be very clearly proven that if a Democratic President gets up a tree the Democratic dogs bark at all intruders, and when a Republican President gets up a tree it is the same old thing; and we appear to occupy positions on constitutional questions of this character according to the exigencies and necessities of our parties.

Our friends on the other side undoubtedly voted for the contention of the Senator from Wisconsin. Then it would be unreasonable for us to expect them to vote that way now. Would it not? In other words, consistency is a jewel.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator takes issue with me on any point I shall be happy to hear from him. If he is on my side, let me go on.

Mr. TILLMAN. I was trying to illuminate the question. I could not do it as well as the Senator from Georgia or the Senator from Wisconsin; but I was trying to ease my friend from Wisconsin out of the unpleasant attitude of being on both sides of this question.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I had not finished what I propose to read from the speech of my distinguished friend. I resume at the particular place where I was reading when the Senator from South Carolina interrupted me.

I hope I may be allowed, in order that the connection may be kept, to read that sentence over again, because the next sentence directly relates to it. I read again that sentence from the Senator's speech:

I assert now the proposition that the Senate has a right to obtain of a Cabinet officer upon demand, and of the President upon request, such information to enable it to act intelligently upon the question as to whether it will advise and consent to a proposed removal.

The Senate will mark that that is not qualified. It is a right to have it, when requested, not conditionally; and the Senator, in full recognition of the fact that that was his meaning, turns to the Democratic Senators and asks this question, referring to the utterance which he has just made:

The Senators on the other side will not, I think, charge that the issue, so far as I am concerned, is not broad enough.

The Senator states it in as emphatic language as his great command of language would permit him, and then emphasizes it by turning to his opponents and challenging them to his statement, that it is as broad as it can be made, and that nobody can find fault with it by reason of its failure to be broad enough.

In other words, Mr. President, the Senator lays down, as broadly as his language will permit him, the proposition that as to anything which relates to the business of the Senate and within the jurisdiction of the Senate the Senate has the right to have it on a request addressed to the President, not a qualified right; and he emphasizes it by the statement that no one can find fault with that statement on the ground that it is not broad enough; and if anybody had challenged him to make it still broader, if he had had it in his power he would have done so, because it was his intention to make it as broad as language would permit.

The Senator then goes on as a lawyer and says this:

Is the proposition sound in law?

That is the great question here to-day.

Is the proposition sound in law? I want no other principle of law to guide me to a conclusion in favor of the right of the Senate to the information upon that theory than is found in the report submitted by the minority of the committee and the message which the President has seen fit to transmit. I call the attention of the Senate to the statement of the law in the report submitted by the minority of the Judiciary Committee. It is very guarded and very advisedly made, and is sufficiently broad and accurate for the purposes for which I desire to use it.

Then the Senator proceeds to quote from the minority report:

"The minority admit"—

Reading now from the minority report—

"The minority admit, once for all, that any and every public document, paper, or record"—

The Senator from Wisconsin then reading that report interjects this language:

Note this, if you please—

"on the files of any Department, or in the possession of the President, relating to any subject whatever over which either House of Congress has any grant of power, jurisdiction, or control under the Constitution, is subject to the call or inspection of either House for use in the exercise of its constitutional powers and jurisdiction."

There spoke Pugh, and George, and Jackson, and Vest, and Coke. Continuing to read from the minority report:

"It is on this clearly defined and well-founded constitutional principle that, wherever any power is lodged by the Constitution, all incidents follow such power that are necessary and proper to enable the custodian of it to carry it into execution. Whether the power is granted to Congress, or either House, or to the President, or any Department or officer of the Government, or to the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, the principle is as fundamental as the Constitution itself that all the necessary incidents of such grants accompany the grants and belong to and can be exercised by the custodians of such powers, jointly or severally, as they may be vested by the Constitution.

"It is on the application and enforcement of this unquestioned rule of construction that either House of Congress has the right inherent in the power itself to direct the head of any Department or request the President to transmit any information in the knowledge of either—"

Then the Senator from Wisconsin again interjects the words:

Note that—

"or any public or official papers or documents, or their contents, on the files or in the keeping of either, provided such papers or documents relate to subjects, matters, or things in the consideration of which the House making the call can use such information, papers, or documents in the exercise of any right, power, jurisdiction, or privilege granted to Congress, or either House, or to the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

That is the end of the part of the minority report which was then read in that speech by the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin, and then he resumed. The Senator from Wisconsin said:

Here, in a lawyer-like way, and in a bold way as lawyers ought to state their case, the minority, without shuffling or technicality, place the question upon this proposition: If the Senate of the United States has any jurisdiction over the subject-matter to which papers relate, or to which information in the hands of a Department officer or in the hands of the President relates, then they say unqualifiedly, and it would seem to be unmistakable law, the Senate has a right to the inspection of such documents and a right to elicit such information. The President, placing it upon a little different ground, recognizes the same principle, and in doing this he only follows the example of Washington in somewhat the same language upon the same subject, and of every Executive from Washington down, thus—

Quoting now from Mr. Cleveland—

"To the end that the service may be improved, the Senate is invited to the fullest scrutiny of the persons submitted to them for public office, in recognition of the constitutional power of that body to advise and consent to their appointment. I shall continue, as I have thus far done, to furnish, at the request of the confirming body, all the information I possess touching the fitness of the nominees placed before them for their action, both when they are proposed to fill vacancies and to take the place of suspended officials."

After reading that the Senator from Wisconsin said:

Why? Because under the Constitution the Senate is a factor in the act constituting, on the whole, the appointment of the officer; because, in the language of the minority of the committee, the Senate, under the Constitution, has jurisdiction over "the subject-matter."

Mr. President, as I say, I regret very much that I can not read the whole speech of the Senator; but on a subsequent occasion, on the 19th of March, the next day, as will be found on page 2529 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the Senator from Wisconsin, in a discussion of the same resolution, uses this language:

Possessing, therefore, the right to call for papers and information from the executive department of the Government necessary to enable the Senate to discharge with fidelity and intelligence its duty under the law in the matter of removals, it can not forego that right when in its opinion its exercise is necessary.

There is the distinct issue made, and there is the distinct proposition so clearly announced by the Senator from Wisconsin. In other words, it can not submit to the statement of the President of the United States that, in his judgment, it is not a matter for the Senate but a matter for him to determine; that the Senate "can not forego the exercise of this right;" that it will not admit and can not acknowledge the right of the President to say that it is not entitled to the papers; but that the Senate will insist upon and maintain its rights. That is the language, or rather the substance, the meaning, of the language of the Senator from Wisconsin.

He continues:

It can not suffer, by its acquiescence, the principle as to papers, now asserted by the executive department, to grow into precedent. It is not a question of etiquette, nor is it a question of politics. It is very far above either.

The Senate has no right to trench upon the prerogative or powers of the Executive. The maintenance, sacred and inviolate, of the prerogatives of the three great coordinate departments of the system under which we live, as the fathers framed it, is essential to the permanency and success of our Government. Neither should be permitted to trench upon the other, and neither may permit any impairment, through aggression or concession, of its constitutional faculties and prerogatives.

By which the Senator certainly meant to say that one of the prerogatives of the Senate was to determine for itself what papers it required, and that it would not forego or surrender that prerogative to the Executive.

The Senate can not yield the principle that in any case or under any circumstances the files of the Departments, evidencing the conduct of public offices, shall be secret from the inspection, or that any paper or letter bearing upon the conduct of a public office, placed upon the files of any Department, or in custody of any executive officer, and which ought to be placed upon the file of any Department, can, at the will of anybody, even though it be the President, become personal and subject to removal or destruction.

Mr. President, the language of the Senator there was directed to the particular subject-matter under consideration, but the reasoning and the language will embrace all matters in an Executive Department, and asserts, as the prerogative of the Senate, and also of the House of Representatives—not the Senate exclusively, except as to matters within its exclusive or peculiar jurisdiction—asserts the right of either House of Congress in a matter in which it has jurisdiction to enter into any executive office; to see anything that is in it; to ask no man's permission to do so, and to receive from no man a denial.

Mr. President, I am glad this question has come up. I sat here yesterday and heard the message from the executive department responding to a resolution introduced by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK] calling for certain information, in which the Senate was told that, in the opinion of the Executive, it was not a proper matter to be sent to the Senate.

Mr. KEAN. Has the Senator from Georgia read the message of the President of the United States?

Mr. BACON. I only heard it read.

Mr. KEAN. If the Senator would read the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury accompanying the message, I think he would find a very good reason given for the declination to furnish the information.

Mr. BACON. I do not care what the reason is.

Mr. KEAN. It is a very good one.

Mr. BACON. If the request by the Senate was not qualified, and was made in the discretion of the Department or of the President, it matters not what the reason is which is assigned for refusal. The reason can properly be conveyed to the Senate before final action is taken upon the demand of the Senate. If there is a good reason, it is perfectly proper that the President should send to the Senate a communication in confidence, that for such and such reasons he asks that the demand shall not be insisted upon. Can anybody doubt that, if any proper reason is given in such a case, the Senate will not respect a suggestion of that kind?

But to refuse is to deny; it matters not whether it be for a good or a bad reason, the power to refuse is the thing; and if the President has the power to refuse, he has the power to refuse for a bad reason as well as for a good one; and when he refuses, it matters not what is the reason, good or bad, he has, in my opinion, violated the law and invaded one of the highest prerogatives of Congress, which is to know everything that relates to this Government—everything; and if there was another word that was more comprehensive than that, I would use it. So it matters not, Mr. President, whether the reason be good or bad. If there was a good reason why the information should not be given to the Senate, the proper course would have been, through the proper officer, to have communicated to the Senate that such a demand had been made, and then——

Mr. KEAN. But, Mr. President, that is just what the President did; and if the Senator from Georgia will read what the President says, he will find it out.

Mr. BACON. But the Senator did not hear me through. I say that the proper action to take was to communicate in a proper way to the Senate that such a demand had been made, and to say that for such and such reasons, whatever they may be, in the opinion of the President it would be unwise to furnish the information, and to ask the Senate not to insist upon it; but when he assumes that, in his judgment, that reason is sufficient, and refuses without more, it matters not whether it is good or bad, sufficient or insufficient, he can control it. So I say, Mr. President, that if you admit his right in his judgment, upon what he may consider to be a good reason, to shut the door of a Department, the power is unlimited to shut that door upon any judgment or any reason which he may deem to be sufficient.

Mr. President, that is the exact point that was involved in the great debate of 1886 in this Chamber; that was the exact point at issue, and the only point at issue. It was maintained with great power and ability, and I think with conclusiveness of argument on the part of the Republicans, that the President did not have that right; and in the language of the Senator from Wisconsin, which I have read, it was vigorously contended that it was the high prerogative of the Senate and that the Senate would not forego it at the behest of any man, be he even the President.

Mr. MITCHELL. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL. Does the Senator from Georgia draw any distinction between the two cases: In one case where papers are called for bearing upon the question of the removal of a man from office and, in the other case, where papers are called for in connection with the consideration of a treaty?

Mr. BACON. None whatever, because the principle is absolutely the same.

Mr. MITCHELL. Then the Senator does not agree with the position taken by President Cleveland.

Mr. BACON. I certainly do not, and I am unqualified in agreeing with what was said on that occasion by distinguished Republicans in the debate.

Mr. MITCHELL. One other question. The Senator has stated that that was the only question discussed at that time. There was another question, and a still more important one in my judgment, which was reported by the Judiciary Committee, discussed at length, and passed upon, and that was what action should be taken in the event of the Senate of the United States calling upon the President of the United States to send papers to the Senate—for instance, it may have been in the consideration of an appointment—and the President refused to send the papers. The position of the Republican party at that time was that it was the duty of the Senate to stop business, to refuse to consider appointments, and there was quite an extensive controversy over that matter. Now, I want to ask the Senator from Georgia: Suppose the President is called upon for papers and declines to submit them, what is the remedy?

Mr. BACON. There is none.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is there any remedy except by impeachment?

Mr. BACON. None whatever; nor is there any remedy for any dereliction of duty by the President save only that. But that does not answer the question; that does not meet my proposition at all.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator, I think through inadvertence, has twice said within the last few minutes that the Senate had made a demand on the President. The Senate always requests the President.

Mr. BACON. In this case I will state to the Senator that I am not incorrect in the use of language, for the reason that I was discussing a resolution which had been adopted by the Senate, which was a direction to the Attorney-General, and which was replied to by the Attorney-General in the name of the President, so that it was a demand in that case. But in all of the debate to which I have referred all the Senators spoke of it as a right to demand or direct a subordinate officer, and a right to receive information on a request to the President, and a right which they would not forego.

Mr. GALLINGER. What has puzzled me somewhat as a layman is to differentiate between the demand upon a Cabinet officer and a request made to the President. It has seemed to me that the fact that we request the President carries with it the presumption that he may decline to accede to our request.

Mr. BACON. Not at all. The Senator will pardon me if I reply in the language of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] in that regard.

I should like to quote him as to all these matters, and I will return to what I have already read, in order that I may reply, in much more felicitous language than I can command, to the inquiry of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. The Senator from Wisconsin had been discussing what is the right of the Senate; and he said it is the right of the Senate to receive this information upon the request of any officer, even if it be the President.

Now, if it is right, of course it is not a matter subject to qualification; it is a right which the Senator says it "can not forego"—using that language. I will now read again the last sentence which I read from the speech of the Senator from Wisconsin:

> The Senate can not yield the principle that in any case or under any circumstances—

That is certainly pretty broad language—

> The Senate can not yield the principle that in any case or under any circumstances the files of the Departments, evidencing the conduct of public offices, shall be secret from the inspection, or that any paper or letter bearing upon the conduct of a public office, placed upon the files of any Department, or in custody of any executive officer, and which ought to be placed upon the files of any Department, can, at the will of anybody, even though it be the President, become personal and subject to removal or destruction.

Or subject evidently, according to the context, to the refusal of the President to communicate it to Congress.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, that is certainly very strong and direct language; and if we are to accept that as the correct doctrine, then I apprehend that the phraseology that we request the President, "if not incompatible with the public interest," is a mere matter of courtesy. Is it?

Mr. BACON. Not altogether so. There are many instances where the Senate has used that language because they did not think it of vital importance that they should obtain the information; but I think, as a matter of courtesy, it should always be introduced except in a case of extreme urgency.

I do not know that the Senator from New Hampshire heard what I said in the outset of my remarks, that I am not discussing this question so much with reference to this particular resolution, because I have no doubt that, under the assurances already given, the President will furnish us with all that is required, but that the announcement had been made on the other side of the Chamber to-day that as to whether or not the President should respond to any request the Senate might make of him was a matter within his discretion, and I cited the Senate to the fact that on yesterday, in response to a resolution previously sent by the Senate directing one of the officers or the head of one of the Departments to send certain information here, we had had a communication from the President that, in his judgment, it was a matter which ought not to be communicated to the Senate.

As I just said in replying to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN], it matters not whether the reason which the President gave was a good one or a bad one, if he has got the right to exercise his judgment as to whether it is good or bad, and to act upon that right when a direction is thus given by the Senate to the head of a Department, then he has the right unqualifiedly in every case to say "no" to any request that may be made for the communication of any information needed by the Senate. That is the proposition which I make, and which I say has been so ably maintained, not by me, but by the distinguished Republican Senators whose names I read. I do not think the Senator from New Hampshire was in the Chamber at the time, but I mentioned the names of George F. Edmunds, GEORGE F. HOAR, William M. Evarts, John J. Ingalls, and Samuel J. R. McMillan, of Minnesota.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator, if he will permit me, that I have been listening with great interest to his very able address, but I was unavoidably called from the Chamber in the transaction of public business and did miss a portion of his speech, which I regret.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BACON. I should like to proceed with my remarks, but I yield.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to suggest to the Senator from Georgia, who has illuminated this subject so fully, an inquiry along this line: Whether there is not a difference between a request for information conveyed in the usual courteous language—"if in his judgment not incompatible," etc.—calling for relatively unimportant information, and a resolution calling for information of much moment. Might there not be some things which the President would feel warranted in sending to us to go into the RECORD or to become public property, and some which he would not feel warranted in sending to us unless it was in the nature of a secret communication, which would be for our information alone?

Does the Senator not differentiate in that particular? Then, if in the judgment of the Senate it was still desirable and necessary that it should have the information, I agree with him entirely—it would have the right to demand that it be sent in confidence. But does not the Senator differentiate between the ordinary courteous resolution of inquiry on matters that are not of very serious moment and those that are vital?

Mr. BACON. I endeavored to suggest that same idea in response to the inquiry of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Now, let me illustrate the orderly way in which this can be done and ought to be done. I will illustrate it by an occurrence during the Spanish war. I introduced a resolution directing the then Secretary of War, the present junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. ALGER], to communicate to the Senate certain information—I have forgotten now exactly what it was—relative to the defenses of the southern coast, where people were apprehensive that they were not prepared to meet the onset which they anticipated. That resolution was sent to the Secretary of War.

If the proceeding for which the Senators on the other side now contend had been adopted the Secretary of War would have gone to Mr. McKinley, and Mr. McKinley would have sent in a message saying that in his opinion it was incompatible with the public interests that that information should be given. That would have been a good reason, but still it would have been an infringement of the prerogatives of the Senate. Instead of that, the proper course was taken. The Secretary of War sent for the chairman of the Military Committee of the Senate, General HAWLEY, and communicated to General HAWLEY the facts which in his opinion would make it improvident and unwise to communicate that information to the Senate, even in executive session, because it might get to the enemy.

General HAWLEY came to me and explained what the Secretary had said. I recognized at once that his reason was a good one; and as soon as the Senate met I myself moved that the Senate withdraw the request, and it was withdrawn. Can anybody doubt that in any case where there is a good reason for it a similar course would not be taken?

But, Mr. President, while that course is practicable and works no harm, whenever you once set up as a law the right of the President to say peremptorily, "I will not give the information," you give him the right in all cases and under all circumstances to close the door to the inquiries of the Senate; because if he has the power in one case, he has it in all, and the question of its exercise is a question solely in his discretion.

Mr. President, I had no expectation when I rose of occupying so much of the time of the Senate, because I really did not feel physically able to do so, but I want to read a little more of the debate from which I have been quoting.

While the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] made an argument in that case which is not surpassed in its ability and soundness by that made by any other Senator, arguments upon the same line were made by others of the distinguished men whose names I have mentioned and by some others whom I have not mentioned.

I will read now what Mr. Logan, then a member of the Senate from Illinois, said. He may not have been as distinguished a lawyer as some others whose names I have mentioned, but still I think he enjoyed the confidence of the people as a man of strong mentality and as a lawyer of ability. Said Mr. Logan, then a Senator from Illinois—and I read from page 2799 of the same volume from which I have been reading:

If the people through their representatives can not have access to the records of the country, on the general theory that they are the source of power, when such records or documents are requested to aid in the performance of a duty incumbent upon them in their coordinate capacity, where is such a theory to carry us if it is followed up?

And that is the important inquiry.

We have been told for years by our opponents that the concentration of power was one of our objects; that our theories as well as the character of our legislation proved this to be the design of our party—that this had been increasing and growing from year to year; that the power of the Government was being placed in the hands of the few; that the people were being stripped of their power day by day.

Referring to the Republican party—

I should like for any Senator to tell me—

I hope Senators will listen to this language—

I should like for any Senator to tell me what greater concentration of power has been shown during the existence of this Government than the attempt made by the President of the United States to take into his own hands the right to allow or not the people of this country through their representatives to examine public records, documents, and papers as he sees proper. Suppose the man guilty of fraud; suppose he has been guilty of embezzlement; suppose he is charged with any offense; will the President of the United States say, when we send for the papers to examine into the conduct of his office to see how it has been managed because he has suspended this man, the Congress of the United States shall not examine the papers?

Will you say that? Suppose the Senate of the United States organizes a committee of investigation to-day and calls upon the President of the United States, the Attorney-General, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster-General, or any other head of a Department, for papers in connection with the case either for or against the man accused, will it be said that the Senate of the United States can not have those papers? If so, why refused? Would it be on the ground that they are private documents? Is that the ground?

But, Mr. President, the same argument might be used as to any other information which Congress might need in the conduct of its business. There is no argument which could be used in favor of the right of the Senate to see any paper connected with the question of an office where the incumbent was under investigation, or where inquiry was to be made concerning him, which does not apply with equal force and conclusiveness as to any other subject-matter relating to the Government about which Congress asks information, and there is no reason why the President should be clothed with a power to shut the door for one purpose which would not give him an equal power, if he saw fit to exercise it, for another purpose, and it may be either in the same Department or another Department of the Government.

I will read further from Senator Logan.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. What page?

Mr. BACON. Page 2799 of the same volume:

If this theory is to be carried out—

That is, the right of the President to deny access to any paper or any document or any information in one of the Departments—

If this theory is to be carried out, the head of a Department might suppress papers that would convict his friends; he might suppress papers that would convict criminals; he might suppress papers that would convict himself if he be corrupt enough, and this merely upon the ground that they were private papers and could not be given out. Suppose papers charging men with violations of law, charging them with robbery, with theft, with murder, with arson, no matter what crime, came to the Secretary of the Treasury as a letter directed to him making these charges, because the letter is written to him and not officially, but is filed with the papers in the archives of the Government, when the Senate calls on him for those papers he says, "It is a private letter. I shall not give it to the Senate or the Congress of the United States," though on the files.

Would not that be covering up crime under the guise of private papers on the ground that they will not deliver documents to the Congress of the United States that might involve in criminal proceedings some individual who happens to be an official of the Government and friend of the Secretary?

Of course, Mr. President, the same illustration can be used as to any other information which Congress may desire as to any subject-matter about which it wishes information in the disharge of its great and high duty.

There are numbers of other quotations I might make, but I will read from Mr. Evarts, a great constitutional lawyer. This is to be found on page 2742 of the same volume. I will not read the whole of it. I should like to do so, but I will only read the most pertinent part.

That great lawyer, Mr. President, comes down to this distinct question, and it is a great question in the case, as in the case of the difference between the Senate and the President upon the question of the communication of information to the Senate. In that case of difference who is to determine it, the Senate or the President? That is the question which was in that great debate, and one upon which that eminent man made these utterances which I am now to read:

It is said in the first place—

That is, by the opponents—

It is said in the first place, and thus the proposition of the committee is sought to be avoided, that the papers called for can by no means touch any matter subject to the public action of the Senate. Let us look a moment at that proposition. Who is to determine in the first place that on a topic which the Senate has to do with it has a right to the inspection and use of papers in the Departments, but it has no such right when the Senate can not possibly touch or deal with any subject-matter to which those papers relate? Who is to determine in the first instance that the Senate may or may not explore and make use of papers that are on file? Certainly the Senate is the judge of that.

What does he mean? The question at issue was whether the Senate was the judge when the President desired that information should not be given or whether the President was in that case the judge; and Mr. Evarts says:

Certainly the Senate is the judge of that.

The Senate, as a component part of the legislature represented in Congress, is not of limited jurisdiction. It is not confined to this or that topic. Whatever touches, in the language of one of the clauses of the Constitution, the common defense and the general welfare belongs to the two Houses of Congress. When, therefore, either House under its responsibilities and under the determination of a constitutional majority of votes on any subject in either of these Houses undertakes itself to deal with public documents and papers in the Departments, it deals with what belongs to the Government of the United States for use by the Congress of the United States, and upon its judgment of what its duties, its faculties, and its proposed actions relate to.

Mr. President, could language be more explicit and more comprehensive than that? I repeat it. He says that it acts—upon its judgment of what its duties, its faculties, and its proposed actions relate to.

In other words, it does not act upon what the President may think its duties, its faculties, and its powers may be, but that the Senate is the one to judge what are its faculties, it duties, and its powers, and that all these documents are not the documents of the President of the United States, but of the Government of the United States, and the Senate was entitled to the inspection of each and all, and that it is for it to determine whether the inspection of any paper or the getting of any information is in accordance with the proper discharge of its duties under its faculties and under its powers.

Thus spoke the great lawyer, and I rest upon him and not upon what I may feebly say:

And now for the first time is it found that a preliminary question arises, when the Houses of Congress, one or both of them, have asked for papers on file, that there is a preliminary judgment to be exercised and to be final, and to be under the unlimited range of discretion and of personal judgment of the President, whether or not these papers that are described and exist as on the files or on deposit in the Departments are on the face of them papers that belong to the uses and for the purposes of the duty of the Houses of Congress.

He announces that as a great and startling proposition, and it is a great and startling proposition, and dark will be the day whenever it comes to be recognized as the law of this land that the President of the United States is vested with power to say what papers or what information Congress shall have, and that if the reason, in his judgment, is sufficient he can close the door to that information and say "no" to the demand of Congress.

The learned Senator and great lawyer, Mr. Evarts, continues:

Where is this preliminary line to be drawn? Who is to be patient under it? Who is to look in the face the two Houses of Congress in the illimitable range of their duty, dealing in the matters of the Departments, dealing with the matters there deposited and there preserved for the Government for its uses, for action in reference to the Government, and for no other purpose whatever?

Who is at liberty to sift and cull out of these papers thus deposited, and to be accorded this prejudgment of the action of the two Houses of Congress? Who is to be this arbiter between the Government and the Congress to determine what shall be given and what shall be withheld?

I should like to find votes cast here on the other side of this alley upon that preliminary question.

I will say to the Senator that if I had been here undoubtedly I would have voted with the Republicans on that issue; and, Mr. President, I desire to say, so far as it has been within my power, I have always contended for the prerogatives of the Senate. The first speech I ever made in this Chamber upon that subject was taking issue with a Democratic President when, in my opinion, his action invaded the prerogatives of the Senate. I will read that sentence again:

I should like to find votes cast here on the other side of this alley upon that preliminary question.

He proceeds:

Give us the premises of the powers of the two Houses of Congress under the Constitution that are not disputed here—I mean the general powers—give us the constitution of the Departments; give us the arrangements of law regulating the action of these Departments; give us the fact that the papers we seek for are in the possession of the Department of Justice and the Attorney-General can lay his hand upon them, and then after that a peremptory instruction of the President can follow out these deposits and select from them those that are suitable for the inspection of the Houses; let it be conceded that it is not thus to be arbitrarily, thus capriciously, thus undutifully discharged by the President in this preliminary authority; let it be agreed that he means to send to the two Houses all that are useful and pertinent to every public use, how do you by that proposition but advance the most monstrous doctrine under the Constitution—

Listen to this, Senators!—

advance the most monstrous doctrine under the Constitution that the President is the judge of what the duty of the two Houses of Congress relates to, and the further question of what the papers would have to say and to show and to decide whether they were or were not important and interesting to the two Houses of Congress on the very matters that the Congress has authority over.

I could continue those quotations to a very great extent, but I have read enough to show what was the attitude of the Republican party upon that question and what was the constitutional view of these great lawyers who then ornamented this Chamber. I do not feel that I can add to it.

But, Mr. President, there is one matter that this question closely relates to, and that is the power of the Executive and the unlimited power which such a concession would make to him.

Now, as illustrative of that, I want to say that that learned coterie of Senators who made the report of the committee, signed by them individually—George F. Edmunds, John J. Ingalls, William M. Evarts, GEORGE F. HOAR, S. J. R. McMillan, and James F. Wilson—were so impressed with the fact that it was the claim of a power which would be most dangerous to the institutions of this Government, that if conceded there was no limit to be set to the Executive power—so impressed were they with that that they not only made this most elaborate and able and luminous report, but they set out as an exhibit the report made to the House of Representatives in the Twenty-seventh Congress, when a similar question was up.

It is called Appendix B. House Report 945, Twenty-seventh Congress, second session. That related to the removal from office of Henry H. Sylvester.

I myself would not as an illustration of the danger of Executive power now bring this report to the attention of the Senate as a warning against the encroachments of Executive power, because, while I might consider it pertinent, I recognize that if I did so, it might be construed as an extreme action on my part and my motive might be misconstrued into an intention to give offense to the Executive.

That purpose I not only disclaim, but say that I would not even venture to have it read, but that it is the report of these eminent Republicans when they were resisting the claim of power by a Democratic President, and in which they were so impressed with the dangers to this Government in the absorption of all power by the Executive that they solemnly set out, as a part of their report, this report made to the House of Representatives in the Twenty-seventh Congress.

I will not burden the RECORD with reading all of it, but I am going to read, not as applicable, I distinctly say, not by inference, but emphatically, in any manner to the present Executive, but simply as the utterance of these great and conservative Republicans as to the danger of unlimited power when wielded by the Executive.

Mr. President, it is a long report, and the whole of it is decidedly interesting, quoting Mr. Webster and others on that subject, but I will read simply an extract from page 17, and I will state that it is in this same document, Report 135, Forty-ninth Congress. I will read an extract on page 17, in which is quoted an extract from a report made by Mr. Benton to the Senate of the United States embracing in part this subject—the question of the absorption of power by the Executive. And I repeat that what I have said to-day is in no manner personal.

I have no special interest in this particular resolution, and if the matter had been limited to this particular resolution I would not have uttered a word, and all that I say is in upholding to the extent of my feeble power the prerogative of the Senate and the House and the denial of the right of the Executive, I care not whether he be a Democrat or a Republican, to say "No," peremptorily and finally, to any demand which may be made upon him by either House of Congress for information as to any matter properly within their jurisdiction and to be used in the discharge of their duty.

Now, with that disclaimer of course I can not be misunderstood in reading this extract. It is simply upon the general question, and in my opinion relates as much to the danger to this Government when one party is in power as when the other is in power:

In 1826 Mr. Benton made a report to the Senate, embracing, in part, this subject, which ought to be carefully read by every American. In that paper we find this powerful passage:

Now I quote from the report of Mr. Benton:

"The King of England is 'the fountain of honor;' the President of the United States is the source of patronage. He presides over the entire system of Federal appointments, jobs, and contracts. He has power over the 'support' of the individuals who administer the system. He makes and unmakes them. He chooses from the circle of his friends and supporters, and may dismiss them, and, upon all the principles of human actions, he will dismiss them as often as they disappoint his expectations.

"There may be exceptions, but the truth of the general rule is proved by the exception. The intended check and control of the Senate, without new constitutional or statutory provisions, will cease to operate. Patronage will penetrate this body, subdue its capacity of resistance, chain it to the car of power, and enable the President to rule as easily and much more securely with than without the nominal check of the Senate.

"If the President himself was the officer of the people, elected by them and responsible to them, there would be less danger from this concentration of all power in his hands; but it is the business of statesmen to act upon things as they are and not as they would wish them to be. We must look forward to the time when the public revenue will be doubled"—

This was in 1826, and of course that proportion has been very largely exceeded—

"when the civil and military officers of the Government will be quadrupled; when its influence over individuals will be multiplied to an indefinite extent; when the nomination of the President can carry any man through the Senate, and his recommendation can carry any measure through the two Houses of Congress; when the principle of public action will be open and avowed—the President wants my vote, and I want his patronage: I will vote as he wishes, and he will give me the office I wish for. What will this be but the government of one man? And what is the government of one man but a monarchy?

"Names are nothing. The nature of a thing is in its substance, and the name soon accommodates itself to the substance. Those who make the President must support him. Their political fate becomes identified, and they must stand or fall together. Right or wrong, they must support him, etc."

Then this report goes on to say:

All this was prophecy then. It is now history.

Mr. President, I must apologize to the Senate, for I recognize that it is due it for having occupied so much of its time; but I agree with what was said by the Senator from Wisconsin in the former debate, that it is a most serious and grave question, one, according as it may be finally determined, very fundamental and far-reaching in its consequences, and for these reasons I have ventured, while taking some part of the time in my own argument, to call the attention of the Senate and the country somewhat at length to the arguments of the distinguished Republican Senators whose speeches I have read in part out of the RECORD.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] has addressed so much of his observations to me and to what I have said——

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will pardon me for correcting him.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. BACON. I have not directed any of my arguments to him. I simply used what he had said on a former occasion as presenting the argument more strongly than I could.

Mr. SPOONER. I wish to make a brief reply to the Senator from Georgia.

The statesman of the old day who prophesied that this would get to be a one-man Government made a prophecy which has not been fulfilled and which, I think, never will be fulfilled. I have no fear of any Executive encroachment upon the Senate or the House. So far as my knowledge of public affairs goes, the Executive has always, with perhaps here and there an exception, treated Congress, and each branch of Congress, with respect and courtesy.

If there has been at any time any want of courtesy in—I will not say by, but in—one branch of the Government toward another, it has been in the Congress toward the President, not in any utterance of the President concerning Congress or any of its Members.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator pardon me?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. BACON. The Senator uses the words "the President." I do not know whether he refers to any particular President.

Mr. SPOONER. No; I refer to any President.

Mr. BACON. I want to say, and I call the Senate to witness, that what I have had to say has been in no sense personal——

Mr. SPOONER. I know that.

Mr. BACON. As to any President.

Mr. SPOONER. I never knew the Senator from Georgia to utter a discourteous word of any President, or of anybody. I did not have the slightest reference to him.

Mr. BACON. But others who did not hear all I have said might construe the Senator's words as implying that he thought I had.

Mr. SPOONER. I did not have the slightest reference to the Senator from Georgia.

I have heard in the Senate within a week observations about the President of the United States and his supposed personal characteristics which if uttered by the President of the United States as to any member of this body would be resented from one end of the country to the other. No President in his official acts is entitled to immunity from criticism. He is entitled to respectful criticism, and in the Senate more than anywhere else on earth, because under the Constitution of the United States this is the body which in the last analysis tries Presidents, and sits in judgment upon them and their right to continue in office.

So I do not hesitate to say (and I have had the same feeling as to remarks which in the past I have heard here about the Supreme Court of the United States) that in the Senate no word ought to be uttered in spirit or manner which could be personal or offensive either to the tribunal which sits in the Capitol or to whomever happens, for the time being, to discharge the duties of President.

Now, the Senator from Georgia has read elaborately from a speech which I had the honor to make when I first entered this body many years ago. I have not read it for fifteen years.

Mr. BACON. I am sure the Senator can not improve on it.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator is always complimentary to me.

Mr. BACON. And justly so.

Mr. SPOONER. I thank him for that; but I notice that when he reads some speech of mine which he thinks is inconsistent with some other speech or position which I am taking he emphasizes quite as much as he compliments. That is his right. I thought that speech, when I made it, was the best speech I ever could make.

I am surprised on listening to it to discover that it was as good as it seems to me now to be. Nor do I find anything in it, save one thing, which is inconsistent, in my judgment, with the attitude which I take to-day. I should be very sorry if in all the years which have passed since then I had not learned some things about the law and about the usages and necessities of government.

That debate was predicated upon the tenure-of-office act, by which Congress had undertaken to limit the President's power of removal from office. I think I stated in that speech the opinion that that act was not constitutional. At any rate, it had always been a subject of doubt. It provided that the President might suspend a man from office, but the officeholder was to continue in office where his term was fixed until the Senate had made of that suspension a removal by confirming the nomination of a successor.

I can not now look at the speech, but from some things which the Senator read and in accord with my recollection, I criticised the action of the Attorney-General in declining to furnish the information because we did not wish it for use in the discharge of a constitutional duty, but wished it for some other purpose. That I took to be insulting. I have not changed my mind at all about that. If the Senate has a right in its legislative capacity or in any capacity to information, it is not for the President to say whether it is wanted for a legitimate purpose or what he deems an illegitimate purpose.

The proposition I made there, and enforced, of the power of either House of Congress to investigate the Departments and to call for information, for letters, papers of all descriptions, for everything tending to disclose the conduct of the Government, I do not altogether agree to now; but as a general proposition I insist upon it to-day as strongly as I did then.

I always have regarded that controversy with Mr. Cleveland as not only a fruitless one, but one hardly worthy the great struggle which was made over it.

I am not willing to say to-day, as language I used in that speech would seem to indicate I thought then, that upon every request the President is bound to furnish in the first instance a specific answer; that he is obliged to send to the Senate any document from the Interior Department, the Treasury Department, the Department of Justice, or the War Department which Congress, or either House of Congress, may see fit to call for.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Or from his own correspondence.

Mr. SPOONER. I will get to that. I think there are exceptions to that rule. I think if the House or the Senate should adopt a resolution calling upon the President to transmit the reports of the secret service of the Treasury Department, the President would be in the highest degree subject to criticism if he transmitted them.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. BACON. In such a case which does the Senator think would be the proper attitude for the President to occupy and the proper course for him to pursue, to send a peremptory refusal to Congress—or to the Senate rather, I should say—or that he should address to it a communication setting forth reasons why it ought not to make the request?

Mr. SPOONER. I thank the Senator from Georgia for his question, for it brings me to an observation which I wish to make. The President first, let me say, ought not to transmit it. It would not be in the public interest that he should comply with that request. They are detectives. They are exploring the country to discover frauds upon the Treasury, upon the Government, counterfeiting, forgeries, conspiracies against the life of the President in more cases than one.

Upon their reports and their investigations depend, perhaps, life—certainly great financial loss and certainly the apprehension and conviction of criminals. There is not a man, woman, or child in the United States who would not say that documents of the kind indicated are confidential and that the public interest from every standpoint requires that they should remain confidential.

Now, what is the decent thing to do? Where Congress desires information which in its nature may be confidential, should it be a request or a demand that it be furnished, putting the President in the attitude in reply of a peremptory refusal, putting him where it may be said of him that he has defied the Congress, or is it the polite and the fair position that the Senate or the House should recognize the character of the document, should recognize the fact that it is confidential in its nature, and that a public interest might or might not be injured by a refusal to transmit it, and to incorporate in the resolution the qualification, "if in his judgment not incompatible with the public interest?"

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. BACON. I entirely agree with the Senator. I think the latter is the proper course.

Mr. SPOONER. That is all we have been contending for as to this resolution.

Mr. BACON. Oh, no; I beg pardon. I am not discussing this resolution.

Mr. SPOONER. I am.

Mr. BACON. I am discussing the general statement made by the Senator and others, the question as to whether or not information required by Congress shall be the ultimate decision of the President or of Congress.

Mr. SPOONER. We have not got to that.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me a moment——

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. BACON. I distinctly stated—I do not know whether the Senator was in his seat at the time I made the statement or not—that I thought in all cases except in a case of great urgency it is entirely proper to put the language in, and that it is only where Congress should come to the conclusion that it is of paramount importance and peremptory in its nature that it should not put in the qualification.

I think that in nine hundred and ninety-nine cases out of a thousand that language should be used; and I think that wherever the language is not used it is perfectly consistent with propriety and a proper respect to the Senate that the President should communicate to the Senate respectfully the fact that in his opinion it ought not to be communicated, and give his reasons; and it is not to be assumed for a moment that under such circumstances the Senate would ever insist.

But I am simply on the abstract question which was discussed in the great debate in 1886, as to whether the President has the final power to say to Congress, whenever it calls for a paper or for information, "I will not give it, because in my judgment it ought not to be given."

Mr. SPOONER. We never got to the final question in that transaction, nor have we approached it now as to this transaction. I am attempting to reply——

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. SPOONER. If my friend will allow me, for I do not wish to take any time to-morrow——

Mr. CULBERSON. I simply want to ask the Senator one question.

Mr. SPOONER. Well.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Senator has been illustrating with the subject of secret service, men clothed by the different Departments with duties to execute the law of the United States. By the Constitution of the United States it is made the duty of the President to see that the laws are faithfully executed. Neither House of Congress is associated with him in that requirement. On the contrary——

Mr. SPOONER. I thought the Senator wanted to ask me a question.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will ask it. On the contrary, in the matter at hand, the President and the Senate are clothed with the duty which we are seeking to perform, and I ask the Senator if there is not a broad and well-defined distinction between the right of the Senate to inquire into the execution of the law by the President, and to inquire into the correspondence between him and foreign governments with respect to our joint duty to make treaties?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes, Mr. President, there is a distinction, but the distinction is not in the line which the Senator attempts to draw it, in my judgment. I think that as a rule as to the Departments, which Congress creates and which Congress can abolish, and which are administered under laws enacted by Congress, in nine hundred and ninety-nine out of a thousand cases we should do what we have done. We should, when we wish information, direct the head of the Department to send it. I think it is in few cases, relatively, that this qualification should be inserted.

The Senator from Georgia criticises the President for the response to the resolution of a day or two ago as if it invaded some prerogative of the Senate. My friend had not read the message which embodies the resolution sent to the President, nor, I think, had he read the reply. And that brings me back to the distinction which I was attempting to make and the qualification which experience leads me to make in the remarks which I made many years ago on this subject.

This was known by the Senate, and the point was raised here, to be a confidential communication, as a rule, for which the Senate was asking, and there was included in the resolution these words: "If not in his opinion incompatible with the public interest" to inform the Senate so and so. The Secretary of the Treasury writes a letter to the President giving the reasons why in his opinion that report should not be made public, and the President adopts it.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. BACON. I never do a wrong but what I am ready to correct it. I did not notice that that provision was in the resolution.

Mr. SPOONER. I said you did not notice it.

Mr. BACON. I simply heard it read from the desk.

Mr. SPOONER. I said you did not notice it.

Mr. BACON. I thought it did not contain that provision and that it was addressed to one of the heads of Department. Is it not?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. BACON. I think the resolution was changed after it was introduced. Am I not correct in that?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. KEAN. The resolution was changed.

Mr. BACON. I was not familiar with that fact. I heard the resolution as it was introduced, and it was addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. BACON. I recognize the fact that in this particular instance the response of the President was entirely proper.

Mr. SPOONER. Very good. Now——

Mr. BACON. I am speaking of the general proposition. If it had been otherwise, the Senator will contend it would be proper in the absence of that language.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from Georgia admits my contention by his interruption. I knew he must do so. I did not impute to him any willingness at all to be unjust to the President. He admits my contention, Mr. President, that where the paper for which the Senate desires to make request is in its nature a confidential paper, and if it is left by the resolution to the judgment of the President as to whether it can with due regard to the public interest be made public, and he withholds it upon the ground that the public interest would be injured by publicity, he is respectful to the Senate.

Mr. BACON. Nobody has ever contended otherwise.

Mr. SPOONER. If, on the other hand, that is omitted from the resolution and the President, with the same opinion as to the public interest, sends back a message that in his judgment the public interest requires that it should not be made public, he would be liable to the criticism which the Senator from Georgia, in ignorance of the true character of this resolution, passed upon this very message.

That is one reason why I have thought that the Senate always, in legislative session and in executive session, in requesting the President by resolution to send to this body a paper in its nature confidential, should insert in it this qualification, so as thereby to protect the President, whatever his politics may be, from criticism as to having sharply closed the door without reason to an inquiry of this body.

Mr. GORMAN. Will the Senator from Wisconsin permit me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. GORMAN. Does the Senator from Wisconsin hold that under the act organizing the Treasury Department, where Congress has reserved the exclusive power, without passing through the office of the Executive, the same rule applies to that Department which he is now arguing as to other Departments and as to the President himself?

Mr. SPOONER. The Treasury Department?

Mr. GORMAN. Yes, the Treasury Department.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. GORMAN. Under the act organizing that Department we have distinctly and broadly provided——

Mr. SPOONER. That they shall report to Congress.

Mr. GORMAN. The right to bring the Secretary of the Treasury direct before either House of Congress. Does the Senator think that this rule should apply to that Department?

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator contend that we have not the right to bring any of the Secretaries, except the Secretary of State, within certain limits——

Mr. GORMAN. No.

Mr. SPOONER. Before our committees to answer questions?

Mr. GORMAN. No; I do not.

Mr. SPOONER. No; nor do I.

Mr. GORMAN. The Senator will remember, as well as I do, that special provision was made regarding the one who holds the purse strings, and that he was made directly amenable to Congress and required to report directly to this body.

Mr. SPOONER. Oh, that is his annual report?

Mr. GORMAN. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. He reports to Congress; but what has that to do, if I may ask, with deference to the Senator from Maryland, with the question which I am discussing? He is an administrative officer. He is executing the laws of the United States which relate to the Treasury, and he has to do with a great many transactions which in the interest of the public are secret, and as to which the public interest would be destroyed if he were obliged upon the demand of either House to transmit them to Congress.

Mr. GORMAN. It never has been held so.

Mr. SPOONER. It always ought to be held so. In other words, Mr. President, I maintain only this, that where the nature of the communication or the report which is called for is confidential, inherently confidential, the President, who under the Constitution is charged with the general administration of the law, who selects his Cabinet officers, who is held responsible for the manner in which they discharge their duties, ought to have an opportunity, in response to a demand from Congress, without being subject to animadversion as contemning a prerogative of either House, to say in reply, in my judgment, "this is not compatible with the public interest." That is all there is to it.

I will take the War Department, which the Senator from Georgia referred to a while ago. Suppose we had reason to apprehend trouble with some foreign government, and we passed a resolution directing the Secretary of War to inform the Senate, or the House, if it passed such a resolution, how much ammunition the Government of the United States had in store and how much could from day to day be supplied; would not the President of the United States, be justified, if, in his judgment—and he would know better, for it is his business to conduct our foreign relations, and his alone under the Constitution; he would know better than either House of Congress could know whether that information given to the public would not be detrimental to the public interests—in declining to furnish, because to make it public would, in his judgment, be incompatible with the public interest?

Suppose he were called upon to inform the Senate or the House in a public way as to the condition of our coast defenses, would not the same observation be true as to that? Suppose the Secretary of the Navy were called upon to inform the world of the location of every ship in our fleet. All I say about that is, not that Congress may not properly ask for the information, but it is that the President, in his judgment—and he must be the judge, primarily, at least—has the power to say from his larger knowledge of the situation: "It is, in my opinion, incompatible with the public interests that this information be given to the world."

Now, tell me whether in such case it is not the polite, the fair, and the decent thing to put that qualification in the resolution, in order that the President may, without criticism, just or unjust, in compliance with the resolution itself, say: "It is, in my judgment, incompatible with the public interests."

Take the Department of Justice, which is charged with all the lawsuits in the United States. In the speech from which the Senator from Georgia quoted I spoke too broadly, in my judgment. I know it now better than I knew it before, for I know more about the Government.

Could we, although we created the Department and we may abolish it by law if we choose to do so, drag out from the Department of Justice all the papers, reports, and documents which the Senate or the House of Representatives might wish to inspect?

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me, the question of policy is one thing and the question of right is another.

Mr. SPOONER. I am talking, Mr. President, about the question of decency.

Mr. BACON. Ah, that is all very well; but that does not answer the argument, Mr. President, and the Senator knows that as well as anyone.

Mr. SPOONER. I know this, Mr. President, that the President of the United States who was asked by either House of Congress to make public papers which, under his oath and from his better knowledge, he knew would injure those public interests would be unfit for his place if he did not decline to do so.

Mr. BACON. Does the Senator think that the President ought to peremptorily decline?

Mr. SPOONER. Ah——

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me, I hope he will let me ask my question.

Mr. SPOONER. Very well.

Mr. BACON. Does the Senator think the President ought to peremptorily decline, or ought he not to communicate to the House asking for the information his reasons why the request should not be preferred or insisted upon?

Mr. SPOONER. I think he ought to be put in a position where he is not obliged to peremptorily decline. I think Congress ought to recognize the fact that the public interests may be served only by his declining and so word its resolution as that he may do his duty without having the word "peremptorily" applied to him.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. TILLMAN. Does the Senator think that the President can legitimately or properly or decently claim that he has the public welfare more at heart than has the Senate when he communicates with us in secret?

Mr. SPOONER. No, sir; I do not claim that any branch of the Government has the public welfare more at heart than another branch of the Government. But I do claim this; that so far as the duties of the President are concerned, he knows more about the public interests within his domain than the other branches of the Government may know as to those things that are confidential.

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, then——

Mr. SPOONER. He knows better, Mr. President, what are the conditions of our foreign relations than the world may know. One reason why the Confederation was found to be weak was that the Congress was the organ of communication with foreign governments. One reason, Mr. President, that the sole conduct of our foreign relations, when the Constitution was adopted, was placed in the President was that it should be deposited in one source because of the secrecy and the quickness of action which might be necessary in order to subserve the public interests.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SPOONER. We might just as well say, Mr. President, if we called upon the President when war was approaching to report to Congress what his plans of campaign were or when the war should be declared, that he would not be justified in declining to transmit such information. I do not favor any more than does the Senator from Georgia the relinquishment by this body of one, however small it may be, of its prerogatives.

I do not think that any Department of the Government should be permitted in anywise to invade another—judicial, legislative, or executive—but I do repudiate the notion that there may not be in the conduct of public affairs transactions and information which, for the safety of the country—and that was the purpose of the Constitution—may not be kept close in the mind of the Executive.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SPOONER. I hope my friend will permit me to get through. However, I do not know how I can refuse to yield to him.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I was trying to bring the Senator, if I could, to the question at issue——

Mr. SPOONER. I have been getting there. [Laughter.]

Mr. TILLMAN. And that is, the right of the Executive to deny to the Senate, which is the coordinate branch of the treaty-making power, information which will enable it to determine whether or not it will ratify his action as Executive in having negotiated a treaty. That is the point, and that is the only point here.

Mr. SPOONER. That is not the point.

Mr. TILLMAN. And all of this high-flown—I do not want to use any offensive word, but the Senator is so eloquent, is so earnest, is so adroit, and can so persuade us as to "make the worse appear the better reason," that I like to get him back to the ground——

Mr. SPOONER. I wish I could only persuade you once in a while.

Mr. TILLMAN. Whenever you are right you can persuade me without the least trouble.

Mr. SPOONER. No, Mr. President, the Senator does not state the point that is at issue in this debate. It is not a question of what the Senate has the right to demand of the President. That is not the point in debate, although we have been debating it. The point in debate is this: What form shall a resolution take in the Senate which calls upon the President for information inherently confidential? That is the point.

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator will pardon me for saying that has not been the point which I discussed.

Mr. SPOONER. It has not been. I agree to that.

Mr. BACON. It has not been. I expressly disclaimed that I had sole reference to this particular resolution.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will permit me, I want to say that I myself have expressly disclaimed, not only for myself, but for all of us on this side of the Chamber, any purpose or intention to insinuate or to do anything which would reflect on the President's integrity of purpose or his patriotism. We merely want certain facts.

Mr. SPOONER. I am not belittling or insulting the President of the United States by defending his patriotism or his integrity. He needs no defense as to either. That is not the question.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then the question is whether we on this side have endeavored to treat him with discourtesy.

Mr. SPOONER. I am not talking about you. I am talking about the general proposition.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am talking about the resolution which was presented from this side, on which we are asking the action of the Senate, which calls for certain information in regard to this treaty—that and nothing more. If I understand the Senator from Wisconsin, he contends that there is a discourtesy here. We disclaim it; we deny it.

Mr. SPOONER. I did not contend that. This is an abstraction. That is the truth about it.

My proposition is this: It is not made simply to this matter, for this resolution ought not to have been here, in my judgment, in the open Senate, it is made upon the principle—and it is intended to be addressed to this Senate not only as to this resolution, but as to all similar resolutions emanating from the Senate—that the proper form of resolution is that to which we have adhered so long as I have known anything about the Senate, to ask the President, if not in his judgment incompatible with the public interests, to send such papers to the Senate.

There never has been a President in the White House who has been more frank, Mr. President, more utterly free from concealment of public matters, than the present occupant of the Presidential mansion—not one—and I have no more doubt than I have of my existence that the President will send, however the resolution may be worded, every shred of paper which the resolution calls for. I know of nothing that need be concealed; I want nothing concealed, and it is safe to say that the President has nothing which he desires to have concealed. It is only what is the proper attitude as to such matters for the Senate to take, not simply as to this President, but as to all Presidents.

Now, Mr. President, I want to go just one step further and I shall finish. I think there is a distinction between the State Department in respect of its relation to the Senate and the other Departments of the Government. That Department was not required to report to Congress. The Secretary of State has been called, I think, in one opinion of the Supreme Court, "the right hand of the President."

There are undoubtedly matters in that Department which the Senate has a right to call for; but when the Senator from Georgia claims, if he does claim it, that the Senate has a right to call for and to inspect all the documents at all times in the State Department, I think he makes a proposition which can not be sustained; I think he makes a proposition, Mr. President, which would nullify the clear purpose of the original act of Congress creating that Department and would defeat the proper execution of a power which, by the Constitution, is conferred upon the President alone.

I suppose it can not be denied that under the Constitution the conduct of our foreign relations is solely in the Executive. The Supreme Court has repeatedly so decided. It is apparent from the minutes of debates in the Constitutional Convention, and I have never heard it disputed until recently. The President is given the power to negotiate treaties. Suppose you repeal the law creating the State Department. You do not minimize at all, nor can you, the power of the President to conduct our foreign relations—his power to negotiate treaties.

He can not make a treaty without the intervention of the Senate; but his negotiation of it, as to the manner of it, as to the form of it, as to the agency by which it shall be carried on, is absolutely, under the Constitution, his prerogative, with which neither the Senate nor the House of Representatives nor the Congress has anything whatever to do or in relation to which it has anything to say.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. CULBERSON. When the Senator states that the President negotiates treaties, if he means to confine it to the practice of the Government, well and good. If he means to say, however, that the Constitution expressly clothes the President with any such power, I think, upon reflection, he will not insist upon it, because the only phrase in the Constitution upon this subject is this——

Mr. SPOONER. I know what the Constitution says.

Mr. CULBERSON. Still, I should like to get it in the RECORD.

Mr. SPOONER. Very well.

Mr. CULBERSON. "He [the President] shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties."

Mr. SPOONER. Yes; I know that.

Mr. CULBERSON. And of course the Senator, I do not believe, will insist that there is any special authority given in the Constitution clothing the President with power to negotiate treaties. It is the practice of the Government, and the correct practice.

Mr. SPOONER. Oh, Mr. President, it is not the practice of the Government. The President does not exercise that power by the sufferance of Congress. He does not exercise that power by any prescriptive right; neither is it to be spelled out of the Constitution. It is there.

Who is to negotiate a treaty? Can the Senate negotiate a treaty under the Constitution? The Constitution says the President may, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, make treaties, but a treaty has to be negotiated before it can be made by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Who is to negotiate it? In the old country, from which we took our institutions in part, the King negotiates treaties.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. CULBERSON. I want to ask the Senator how he accounts for the early practice and custom of the President to confer openly with the Senate as to the making of treaties?

Mr. SPOONER. What does the Senator mean by "confer openly?"

Mr. CULBERSON. I mean conferring personally with the Senate in the Senate Chamber about the terms of a treaty before it was ever entered into or ratified.

Mr. SPOONER. Well, Mr. President, it hardly grew into a practice, and it never was open.

Mr. LODGE. It never happened but once.

Mr. SPOONER. Once, Mr. President, Washington, I think, consulted the Senate privately, not openly, as to some treaty which he proposed to make.

Mr. LODGE. A treaty with an Indian tribe.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not remember. Perhaps it was with an Indian tribe. He was not compelled to do that. I suppose President Roosevelt could come down here, consult with us, and take our advice in advance if he chose to do so, but it would be only advisory. He would be entitled to entirely disregard it and make a treaty on entirely different lines. Such action would not be a ratification of the treaty. The Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] shakes his head.

Mr. BACON rose.

Mr. SPOONER. I did not mean the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BACON. But I shook my head. I refer to the Senator using the word "make" when he should have said "negotiate."

Mr. SPOONER. I said that would not make a treaty; that would not preclude the necessity that the Senate, after the treaty was negotiated, should help the President make it by ratifying it.

But there is only that one instance in the history of the country. Is it pretended here by any lawyer in this body that it is not the sole function of the President to negotiate treaties? The other Departments execute laws which we pass; they owe their creation to Congress, and their duties are defined by Congress. The President's power to negotiate treaties comes from the power to which we owe our existence—the Constitution. We can not confer added power in that respect upon him by law, nor can any law enacted by Congress impair in the slightest degree his constitutional power in respect of treaties.

Suppose you abolished the State Department and there was no longer a Secretary of State. The President could still as completely as now, although not as conveniently, negotiate treaties. To-day he can bring the ambassador from Great Britain into the White House and negotiate a treaty with him. Could the Senate call upon him for the conversation or the memoranda upon which it was based? I mean would the Senate have a right to do so? It could request it.

Suppose it were a treaty of alliance, if you please, which involved the relation of both Governments to the world, so that to give it publicity would be fatal to the interests of this Republic. Will any man claim here that the Senate would have the right—they would have the right to request; but would they have a right so that the President would be violating his duty or invading the prerogative of the Senate if he refused to accede to its request?

All I said in the speech from which the Senator from Georgia quoted and all the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] has said in his speech as applied to the Departments of this Government might be admitted for the sake of argument, and still it be true, Mr. President, that, so far as the negotiation of treaties is concerned—the negotiation, mind you, of treaties is concerned—we may ask the President to send us all information pertinent to the treaty, or which would aid the Senate in an intelligent consideration of it; but that we have a right to demand of the President that all his instructions, that every step in the progress of the negotiations, shall be sent to the Senate without his right, involving no disrespect to the Senate, to decline to send it to us, I am not prepared to admit.

Now, Mr. President, after all, we all want to do the right thing. Senators want these papers. I want to see the resolution put in the usual form. I expect the President to send in everything. The Senator from Texas said that in no paper yet had the President stated he had sent all of the papers.

Mr. CULBERSON. I think he has not.

Mr. SPOONER. I suppose, in answer to this resolution, worded as such resolutions ought to be, the President will say that he has sent all the papers, or he will say that he has withheld some, because, in his opinion, the public interest requires it. I do not anticipate anything of that kind, but suppose there were. I am not speaking about this particular transaction; I am speaking upon that subject generally.

I am sorry to have taken the time of the Senate. I speak earnestly about the matter. I want the dignity of the Senate maintained; I want the relations between the Senate and the President to be what the Constitution intended and what the public interest requires.

The only difference between us is not in the result—it is not only for this case, either—but it is as to what is the proper course, whether we shall pass this resolution in the form introduced here, so that if the President should withhold any paper in this case or any other for reasons which he thinks are good he shall be subject to animadversion and criticism to the statement that, "Ah, there is something here that is mysterious," or whether we should not, accomplishing the same result, put in this qualification, so that whatever his answer may be nobody can say that it is anything but courteous to the Senate.

That is all there is to it; and the other talk, the debate of my friend from Georgia and a part of mine, is an abstraction. If the President of the United States in a case where we have a right to obtain information should refuse to accord it, and the Senate should still demand it and he should still refuse, giving no reason for it, we could not enforce it. No President will ever do that, I think, and our intercourse with the President as to these matters ought to be such as to minimize all possibility of feeling or friction.

If I know my heart, and I think I do, what I feel and think upon this subject does not apply simply to a Republican President, but to any man who shall occupy that chair. While I have a place in the Senate I shall vote, where the document called for is in its nature confidential, to include in the resolution this qualification.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, it is getting late and I desire to discuss this resolution briefly. If it is the desire of the Senator who has charge of the matter——

Mr. CULLOM. Does the Senator from Mississippi desire to make a long speech?

Mr. McLAURIN. I should like to make a speech——

Mr. CULLOM. It is only half past 5.

Mr. McLAURIN. It will take some time, and I should prefer to go on to-morrow.

Mr. CULLOM. I had expected to get a vote on the resolution to-night, and I should like very much to do so.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from Mississippi can discuss this subject later.

Mr. ALDRICH. There are plenty of other resolutions.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator can make his speech on almost any of the resolutions, if he wants to speak generally on the subject of the treaty.

Mr. SPOONER. Or on this subject.

Mr. CULLOM. Or on this subject.

Mr. McLAURIN. No, sir; I want to address myself to the pending resolution. I supposed this would be about the adjourning hour and that the discussion would not go on until to-morrow. However, if it is the desire of the Senate that I shall go on with what I have to say, I can say it now.

Mr. CULLOM. I should like very much if the Senator could do so, unless he desires to speak longer than he ordinarily does. It is only half past 5. The time is coming, I think, when we ought to sit longer each day than we have been doing heretofore. We have been in session now nearly three months, and we are making very little progress.

Mr. McLAURIN. I prefer to speak to-morrow on the resolution, but if the Senator or the Senate insists, I will go on now with what little I have to say.

Mr. CULLOM. I should like to dispose of this resolution this evening.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest to the Senator from Mississippi that there are a series of resolutions upon the President's table in relation to this and lateral matters. If it is the desire of the Senate to secure information, if there is any correspondence to be sent, this resolution ought to be passed now, in order that, if there is any such correspondence, it may be used in connection with the treaty. I understand it is the desire of the Senator from Texas that the information shall be secured for use in connection with the treaty. Therefore let us pass the resolution, and if the Senator from Mississippi wants to make a speech on the canal question or any collateral question——

Mr. SPOONER. Or upon this question.

Mr. ALDRICH. Or upon this question, he can just as well make it to-morrow.

Mr. McLAURIN. After this resolution shall have been adopted?

Mr. ALDRICH. After this resolution shall have been disposed of, as he can to-night.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. McLAURIN. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I confess I am a little astonished that what is the common custom of the Senate it is proposed shall be denied to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. McLAURIN. I hope the Senator from South Carolina will not make any appeal on my behalf.

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not think the importance of this matter justifies the adoption of drastic measures and the driving of things. It is not courteous. I hope we will have an executive session now or an adjournment, I have never known anything to be gained here by undertaking to drive anybody.

Mr. ALDRICH. If the Senator from South Carolina regards my request as an effort to drive anybody, he is very much mistaken.

Mr. TILLMAN. I hope the Senate will do what we have always done, and allow the Senator from Mississippi to go on to-morrow, as he wants to do.

Mr. McLAURIN. I assure the Senate——

Mr. ALDRICH. I appeal to Senators to gratify the great desire on the part of the Senator from Texas and other Senators on the other side to secure information by letting this resolution pass at once, and then if later the Senator from Mississippi desires to speak upon this subject he can do so.

Mr. TILLMAN. But the Senator from Mississippi has expressly declared that he does not want to go on to-night and that he does not want to speak on a resolution that has passed the Senate and gone. I do not think, with all due deference to the Senator from Rhode Island, that it is courteous——

Mr. CULLOM. Allow me to make a suggestion.

Mr. CULBERSON. I rise for the purpose of calling the attention of the Senator from Rhode Island to the fact that the Senator from Mississippi expressly stated he desires to debate this particular resolution.

Mr. CULLOM. What I was going to suggest is that if no other Senator desires to speak on this resolution, let us agree that after the Senator from Mississippi makes his speech to-morrow we shall vote upon it.

Mr. ALLISON. That is a good suggestion.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not feel like pressing him into service this evening.

Mr. TILLMAN. Suppose somebody else wants to continue the discussion of it to-morrow. We do not propose to hammer this wind bag, so to speak, just for amusement. We want information. I do not think we ought to be forced to shut off any other Senator who may feel interested enough to take it up.

Mr. CULLOM. If this is nothing but a wind bag, we ought not to spend months on it. We have listened to debate on this question all day to-day and part of yesterday, and it seems to me that a little resolution like this, calling upon the President for information which all of you seem so much to desire, and I do myself, should be disposed of. I want to see the resolution answered. Let us not spend a month on this little resolution. If the Senator from Mississippi desires to speak to-morrow morning, let us allow him to do so, and then vote upon the resolution. I ask unanimous consent that that shall be done.

Mr. CULBERSON. I suggest to the Senator from Illinois that there are very few Senators present—at least a large number are absent—and there might be hesitancy in agreeing or refusing to agree to a request for unanimous consent under the circumstances. It is my judgment that in all probability no one will desire to speak on the resolution to-morrow except the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not want to cut him off. I ask unanimous consent that we may vote on the resolution to-morrow after the Senator from Mississippi shall have spoken.

Mr. TILLMAN. I would have to object to that request on the general proposition that it is not fair to Senators to undertake to get a unanimous-consent agreement on a matter of this kind. We all agree to the request for unanimous consent that we shall vote to-morrow. I do not want to speak and I do not know of anybody else who wants to speak, but I am opposed to this kind of proceeding. That is all.

Mr. McLAURIN. Just one word in explanation of my desire to wait until to-morrow morning

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi has the floor.

Mr. McLAURIN. The Senator from Illinois kindly asked me if I intended to make a speech, and I told him that I preferred to speak to-morrow, as the time was getting late. I understood, although I may have misunderstood him, that he would, upon my getting the floor, make a motion to go into executive session or adjourn, and give me an opportunity to take the floor to-morrow morning after the morning business was transacted and go on with what I have to say. For that reason I had dismissed from my mind the line of thought I intended to pursue, and preferred not to go on, though I can proceed now if it is the desire of the Senate that I shall do so.

Mr. ALLISON. Nobody wants the Senator to do that.

Mr. CULLOM. I am not asking that the Senator shall go on to-night.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suggest that the resolution be taken up at half after 12 o'clock to-morrow and proceeded with, and we will dispose of it to-morrow readily enough.

Mr. CULLOM. Suppose we say "dispose of it before 3 o'clock" or "at 3 o'clock?"

Mr. BACON. I am sure there will be no trouble in disposing of it.

Mr. CULLOM. Let us say 5 o'clock. I want to get something done here and not be talking all the time.

Mr. COCKRELL. We will dispose of it to-morrow, and I think we will adjourn before 5 o'clock.

Mr. McLAURIN. I have no desire to speak longer than fifteen or twenty minutes.

Mr. CULLOM. I have no idea the Senator from Mississippi is going to make a long speech.

Mr. McLAURIN. No.

Mr. CULLOM. He is not in the habit of doing that.

Mr. COCKRELL. We will dispose of the resolution to-morrow.

Mr. CULLOM. I agree to that.

Mr. McLAURIN. Is it understood that I have the floor?

Mr. CULLOM. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the understanding.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I understand the unanimous-consent agreement is that we are to vote on the resolution to-morrow?

Mr. ALLISON. That is it.

Mr. CULLOM. Undoubtedly.

Mr. ALLISON. Let it be put by the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that no such request has been put by the Chair.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then I now ask unanimous consent that we may vote on the resolution to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that a vote shall be taken on the pending resolution to-morrow. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. KEAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 43 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, January 29, 1904, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 28, 1904.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

CONVICT-LABOR CONTRACTS FOR THE ARMY.

Mr. VAN DUZER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. VAN DUZER. I rise for the purpose of offering a resolution for present consideration.

The SPEAKER. Is the resolution a privileged one? The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish to this House at his earliest convenience a statement showing whether or not and to what extent and for what articles any officer or employee of the War Department, with authority to enter into any contract on behalf of the Government of the United States, has entered into any contract of purchase for any article, whatsoever nature or kind, to be used by the army service, manufactured or made by contract labor.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is not a privileged resolution.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, there is so much confusion that we can not hear what he says.

The SPEAKER. What does the gentleman desire—to have the resolution considered now or referred?

Mr. VAN DUZER. I desire to have it considered now.

Mr. PAYNE. I make the point of order that the resolution should go to committee. I object to its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made to its present consideration.

Mr. VAN DUZER. Mr Speaker, I have another resolution——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can withdraw the resolution

if he desires and introduce it under the rule by which it would go through the box and receive proper assignment.

Mr. VAN DUZER. I desire also, Mr. Speaker, to introduce another resolution on the same line.

The SPEAKER. Well, the gentleman can not take the time of the House unless he has a question of privilege.

Mr. VAN DUZER. Well, Mr. Speaker, certainly if there is objection the matter will go over. I simply desired to have the resolution introduced, and if there is objection made of course it will go over.

The SPEAKER. The rules provide how memorials and resolutions shall be introduced, and there is no trouble about the proper reference of them under the rules.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—CONNELL V. HOWELL.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Elections No. 3, I wish to announce that the contested-election case of Connell v. Howell will be called up for consideration one week from next Tuesday, February 9.

Mr. McLAIN. I would like to ask the gentleman in reference to the time to be allowed for debate. Do we agree on that now or do we agree upon it when the case is called up?

Mr. DRISCOLL. I presume we will agree as to time when the case is called up.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time for general debate on the urgent deficiency bill be extended until 5 o'clock to-day, provided that if there is no one desiring to speak we can commence the reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that general debate may be closed upon the deficiency appropriation bill at 5 o'clock to-day, provided that if no one desires to discuss it then the reading of the bill under the five-minute rule shall begin.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, to-morrow is the day for the Committee on War Claims. I do not want to get in the way of this bill, and I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on War Claims may have next Tuesday in place of to-morrow, so that this bill can be finished.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that Tuesday next, in lieu of Friday, be devoted to private business under the rules. Is there objection?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, I wish the gentleman would add to his request, "provided it does not interfere with privileged matters."

The SPEAKER. As the Chair understands it, if consent is given it places Tuesday next precisely in the same position as Friday next—that is, in lieu of Friday, with no more rights than the private bills would have on Friday.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I have no objection, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the urgent deficiency bill.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. TAWNEY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill 10954, the urgent deficiency bill, and the gentleman from Georgia is recognized.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I now yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BENNY].

Mr. BENNY. Mr. Chairman, a few days ago I had occasion to say on the floor of this House that if the old Pharisee who used to stand on the street corner in Jerusalem and thank his Maker that he was not like other men should suddenly come into this Chamber and listen to three ordinary Republican speeches, he would hide his face in shame, and admit that in comparison with the latter-day Republican saints here he, in the old days in Jerusalem, knew absolutely nothing about his business. [Laughter.] I want to say that I understand the old fellow in Jerusalem was a drinking man, and if that be the fact I am very glad that he did not come in here yesterday, or the afternoon of the day before, because if he had I am afraid that he would have gone out of this Chamber and straightway drank himself to death. [Laughter.]

I listened yesterday afternoon to two speeches, and to one on the afternoon of the day before, and it seems to me that the three of them, taken together, show this: Egotism grown so that it is now at least hysteria, and very nearly insanity; claims of power in and credit to the Republican party approaching blasphemy; and braggadocio altogether foolish. I wondered after the last of the three speeches was made last night if there was anything good in the United States of America that the Republican party did not claim credit for, or anything bad that they did not blame the Democratic party for or lay to Almighty God.

I listened with a good deal of interest to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL] on day before yesterday, and when reading from his speech I noticed this: He says that the Democrats, in the election of 1896 and 1900, groveled before a silver image and wore out the knees of their intellectual trousers.

Mr. Chairman, if there can not be better order in the House than there is, may I have unanimous consent to sing the rest of mine instead of speaking it? [Laughter.]

Mr. PALMER. All right, sing it.

Mr. BENNY. I'm such a powerfully poor singer that I have not the heart to inflict myself in that way upon even my friend the enemy.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's point is well taken. The committee will be in order, and gentlemen in the aisles will take their seats.

Mr. BENNY. That was an interesting speech the gentleman made; so pathetic it brought tears to our eyes, and so humorous that it filled the House with laughter, not only on your side, but on ours, and so harsh on the last Democratic candidate that it raised the resentment of every Democrat in the Chamber. I am sorry he spoiled a speech otherwise good by abusing the man who was our standard bearer in the last two campaigns. But I do not think that Mr. Bryan need feel in any way hurt; he is in good company. It so happens that every man who amounted to anything in the United States was abused, and two men who were abused more than any others in the country were the two who stand first and second in United States history—George Washington, number one, and Abraham Lincoln, number two.

In the company of those men, in the abuse that he is receiving from the other side, Mr. Bryan may feel quite comfortable, and I would like to call the attention of the gentlemen on the other side who like to throw things at Mr. Bryan to this fact: A year ago I attended an annual banquet of the board of trade in the city of Newark, in my State, and at that banquet Senator DOLLIVER made a great speech. While the Senator was talking at the banquet he mentioned the name of Mr. Bryan. That brought from the rear of the hall a hiss. Senator DOLLIVER stopped short, and his face grew white and then red. He pictured then and there Mr. Bryan as one of the foremost men of the United States, and he wound up his remarks by saying that there lived in the United States to-day no man who had right or license to hiss at the name of William Jennings Bryan.

I commend the speech of Senator DOLLIVER to the careful attention of those gentlemen on the other side who are perhaps not so great in the country as is the Senator, with the hope that they will profit by it. There seems to be a great deal of joy expressed in these speeches because of the alleged fact that the Democratic party is in bad shape. Let me suggest to my friends over there that it is the Republican party that is to-day sick. It is the Republican party that needs a doctor, and you have not been able as yet to get Doctor HANNA to say a word that is going to help you. Let me also suggest that when the election is over next fall perhaps the gentlemen who have been so loud in their announcements that the Republican party is sure to win may be disappointed; and if it turns out, as we hope it will, that the next election will be a Republican burial, I hope you will have engraved on the side of the tombstone this inscription:

"Here lies the Republican party, once the party of Abraham Lincoln, but long since strayed away from his teachings; the party that helped to abolish black slavery, but a few years later became itself the slave of the great American trusts.

"Let it Rest in Peace.

"Immediate cause of death, these policies:

"1901, Let Well Enough Alone.

"1902, Keep on Letting Well Enough Alone.

"1903, Stand Pat.

"1904, We Hold the Ace.

"P. S.—If that reporter had not written 'ace' when I said 'edge,' we would have been all right.—HANNA.

"P. P. S.—HANNA does not know the game. If he had said 'age,' and not 'ace' or 'edge,' we would have been hunky-dory.—GROSVENOR." [Laughter.]

But I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that in the campaigns of 1896 and 1900 I supported Mr. Bryan. I do not know what kind of an instrument the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL] would say I played on, perhaps a 2-cent tooter; I can not tell. But no man who supported that candidate in those two campaigns need feel any shame about it or feel uncomfortable about it. He was perfectly right in supporting him. I want to ask why it is that men on the other side take so much time and get so much fun out of abusing the man. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT] yesterday said that the Democratic party to-day did not know where it stood on silver. Isn't it a fact that when the Republican convention of 1896 assembled the intention then and there of the majority of those delegates was to put in their platform the same declaration as to the free and unlimited coinage of silver that the Democratic platform contained?

Was it not only because of the argument of the Senator from New York [Mr. PLATT], who told the members of that convention that Wall street and the moneyed interests of the land would be against the Republican party if they adopted that declaration, that the Republican party turned to the other side and adopted the gold plank instead of the silver plank? And isn't it a fact that from the day of his birth until this day Mr. Bryan has always been absolutely honest, and haven't you admitted it? Did you not go over his life as with a fine-tooth comb and find him absolutely blameless? Hasn't he been just as courageous and perhaps more so than any candidate you have ever had?

Why, you brag and blow here about the great courage of the man who is now President of the United States. The man who is a courageous man is the man who dares to do right. The man who shoots a lion or a Spaniard in the back does not necessarily have to be courageous, and I want to ask you if the man who is now President of the United States dares to-day to do what he thinks is right, as Mr. Bryan has always dared to do what he believes to be right?

Mr. Bryan believed, with the leaders of your party, with McKinley, with Blaine, with Sherman, and every man who has amounted to anything in your party in the last twenty-five years, that the free and unlimited coinage of silver was right. I always had my doubts about it. I believed then and now about as Theodore Roosevelt did when he wrote in the Forum for January, 1897, these words:

> There is no doubt whatever that a nation is profoundly affected by the character of its currency, but there seems to be equally little doubt that the currency is only one, and by no means the most important, among a hundred causes which profoundly affect it. The United States has been on a gold basis and on a silver basis; it has been on a paper basis, and on a basis of what might be called the scraps and odds and ends of the currency of a dozen other nations, but it has kept on developing along the same lines no matter what its currency has been.

He believes to-day that he is right. Hasn't he a right to believe that? Isn't he entitled to the same credit for his belief that you have now for your belief? At one time you believed that free silver was right. Now you believe that you were wrong in that and that gold is right. Did not Mr. Bryan show his courage in 1900, when the Democratic convention was assembled, and it was presented in this way to Mr. Bryan by Mr. Hill and the other leaders of the party: "If you, Mr. Bryan, will adopt in your platform a gold plank and let go of the silver, the election is at your mercy—the Presidency is yours." What was his answer? Was it not the same that Clay gave years ago: "I would rather be right than be President." Did he then give way for policy's sake and adopt something he did not believe in and let go something he believed in as he believes in his religion?

What does Mr. Roosevelt do? Does he dare to come forward and do what he believes to be right? I give Mr. Roosevelt the credit of believing in his heart that the trusts are a menace to the prosperity of this country, and that they ought to be controlled in some way. I believe that if he dared he would take that stand. I believe that were it not for the sake of policy, were it not for the fear that he would not be nominated and elected, he would do that. But he has before him to-day the hope of a second term. That is a thing he can not lose sight of. He wants to be elected President of the United States; he wants to occupy that position, not by accident or by the act of God, but by the election of the people, and he knows if he is to succeed he must have for his party the backing of Wall street and the money interests of this country, and therefore he does not dare to do right.

Let me call attention to the President's message in order to prove that proposition. He had an appropriation of half a million of dollars last year to assist the legal department of the Government in prosecuting the trusts. The Administration had that money at its command. It could hire all the extra help it wanted; there was no halt about it; there was no limit to what might be done with that money; it was theirs to do with what they pleased. What have they done? They tell us now that they have spent some $25,000; but where it has been spent, for what purpose, what effect it has had, no one can find out, with the aid even of a microscope.

Now, do you think—does the gentleman from Illinois, or the gentleman from Nebraska, or the gentleman from Indiana who spoke yesterday—does any one of those gentlemen, or all of them, think that Mr. Roosevelt intends this year to prosecute the trusts or begin to do so? That half million of dollars might be compared to a quart of good cream that the doctor had ordered to be given by the nurse to the patient. And this is how Mr. Roosevelt, acting for the nation, now ill by reason of the exactions of the trusts, is going to use his cream. He is going to dump into it two or three gallons of water to help out the quality of the cream.

Listen to his statement of affairs. Here is his message of this year, and on page 8, after reciting the fact that in his last annual message he had asked for this money, which was given to him by Congress, he goes on to say:

> I now recommend, as a matter of the utmost importance and urgency, the extension of the purposes of this appropriation, so that it may be available, under the direction of the Attorney-General, and until used, for the due enforcement of the laws of the United States in general and especially of the civil and criminal laws relating to public lands and the laws relating to postal crimes and offenses and the subject of naturalization.

Now, do you mean to say that President Roosevelt is going to use a half million of dollars to prosecute the trusts? He has asked you in this message to permit him to divert this great sum of money from the purpose for which it was originally appropriated—viz, the prosecution of the trusts—and to scatter that money all over the United States in the enforcement of all the general laws of the country.

Mr. THAYER. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BENNY. Certainly.

Mr. THAYER. Can the gentleman tell me how it happens that the Administration, after securing the assistance of additional prosecuting attorneys, indicted Driggs, a Democrat, in New York, under a statute on which they could convict him and prosecuted DIETRICH under a statute on which they knew they could not convict? Can the gentleman explain how that happened?

Mr. BENNY. Certainly. They wanted to catch the Democrat and they wanted to miss the Republican. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] That is an old expedient; they do it right along; they do it to-day, and they always will. They preach in season and out of season about the great reforms they are going to inaugurate. They are going to stop the use of carriages in the city of Washington by various officers of the Departments, but do they do a thing toward stopping the President of the United States using free trains all over the country by the favor of the railroad companies, amounting, I am told, on his great western trip to at least $65,000? Oh, yes; they are going to stop some Assistant Secretary down here from using a carriage at the public expense, but the President of the United States may still go on using free trains at the expense of the railroad companies.

Now, Mr. Chairman, they undertake to tell us why Mr. Bryan was defeated in 1896 and in 1900. They say that it was the aroused public sentiment that smote the silver image, etc. Let me tell you why Mr. Bryan was beaten in 1896 and 1900. He was beaten by the worst use of money that was ever resorted to in any campaign. He was beaten by the meanest kind of coercion and intimidation that was ever witnessed. During those campaigns in going along by railroad in any of the States of the Union you could see displayed on the side of manufacturing establishments placards with such proclamations as this: "If Mr. Bryan is elected this factory will shut down." The mill owners, or whoever else put up those placards, knew when they placed them there that they were absolutely false, that they had no intention of shutting down those mills. The object was to coerce men to vote their way. And do we not know that all over the United States straw votes were taken in the mills and the factories to find out beforehand how the employees were going to vote? And the Lord's pity was necessary to save the man that they found indicating his preference for William Jennings Byran over their candidate on the other side.

And then they tell you that another reason why the Democrats should be "licked out of their boots" in the next campaign is because Bryan's prophecies were all wrong. I have not a great deal of faith in a prophet from either side. Some of Mr. Bryan's prophecies may have been wrong. One of them was not. The prophecy he made—and that was called to the attention of the House yesterday by some gentleman on the other side—that in case of the success of the Republican ticket in 1896 and in 1900 the wealth of the country would be concentrated in the hands of a few, has been absolutely carried out, and to-day, according to all the statistics, all of the wealth of the country is in the hands of a few men, and when the board of directors of the United States Steel Corporation sit down in conference the twenty-three men there present own one-twelfth of the wealth of the United States. That prophecy was not wrong. Any prophecy he made was not any further wrong than the prophecy that THOMAS C. PLATT, of New York, made to the Republican convention in 1900, when he went there and asked Senator QUAY and his other friends there "for God's sake" to take Theodore Roosevelt out of New York politics by making him Vice-President of the United States. Did they take him out of New York politics? That prophecy went wrong, too.

And then they tell us on the other side, Mr. Chairman, that wages have increased 12 per cent during the Republican Administration and that the cost of living has actually gone down. Now, I do not think that there ever was a more erroneous statement made on this floor than that same one. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL] was very careful when speaking not to give us any figures on the cost of living. Let me give you some figures from Dun's Review, which I suppose every man here will take to have some weight at least.

The figures, based upon quotations of 350 articles, with due allowance for the relative importance of each, are as follows:

	Jan. 1, 1890.	July 1, 1897.	Jan. 1, 1900.	May 1, 1902.	July 1, 1903.	Oct. 1, 1903.	Jan. 1, 1904.
Breadstuffs	$13,765	$10,587	$13,254	$19,954	$17,473	$16,696	.....
Meats	7,620	7,529	7,258	10,968	9,269	8,830	.....
Dairy and garden	12,675	8,714	13,702	14,737	13,083	12,609	.....
Other food	9,955	7,887	9,200	8,742	9,186	9,171	.....
Clothing	14,845	13,808	17,484	15,527	17,136	16,816	.....
Metals	16,240	11,642	18,085	15,702	16,544	16,396	.....
Miscellaneous	15,111	12,286	16,312	16,654	16,765	16,890	.....
Total	99,191	72,455	95,295	102,289	99,456	97,378	$100,142

These figures indicate that the cost of living was 6 per cent higher in 1900 than in 1890, and 31 per cent greater in 1900 than in 1897; 41 per cent more in 1902 than in 1897, and 34.4 per cent more on October 1, 1903, than on July 1, 1897, and about 39 per cent greater on the first day of this year than on the 1st day of July, 1897; 39 per cent increase in the cost of living and 12 per cent increase, taking the figures of gentlemen on the other side, in wages; and yet they say every laboring man in the country and every citizen of the land ought to be thankful that the Republican party has done so much for the laboring man.

There was one thing, Mr. Chairman, that I did like in the speech of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL], and that was his statement that he did give some credit to Almighty God for the prosperity which he claims exists in the country. He was the first Republican that I ever heard on this floor admit that; but even he did not dare tell this House what percentage he claimed of the prosperity of the country was due to the Republican party and what percentage was due to the goodness of the Almighty. I assume that the percentage he was going to credit to the Almighty was so small that he was ashamed to state it.

And then the gentleman from Illinois looked around the room and demanded of some Democrat to contradict his statement that the country was prosperous. Well, I wonder, Mr. Chairman, what condition any man here would expect the United States to be in. Would not our country under natural conditions be expected to be prosperous? Does the gentleman marvel that the United States is prosperous? Why, they remind me a good deal of the log of a ship that came into New York some time ago. The captain one day during the voyage was on watch, and he wrote in the log, "Mate drunk to-day." The mate did not like it very well, and the next day when he was on watch he wrote in the log, "Captain sober to-day." So the Republican party comes here and declares that the United States is prosperous, as though it was an unusual thing.

Why, if you on the other side would let us alone—would not by your laws on the one hand help a certain few people at the expense of many others, and by your failure on the other hand to enforce the laws of the land designed to give all men an even chance—and would not divert the prosperity into certain channels and the money from the prosperity into a few pockets, the country would always be prosperous. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It is only because of that kind of work on your side that the country is ever in any other condition; and yet to-day you marvel that we are prosperous, as though it was natural to expect anything else in our country. I expect it always to be in that condition, and it always will be if you will only give it a fair chance, and let the country and the people in it develop the resources of this, the greatest land in the world, and go along on their way in peace, free from your miserable manipulations.

And then they announce that President Roosevelt is so sure of reelection that there is no use bothering at all; that there is no sense in the Democrats putting up a candidate.

Well, let me suggest to you gentlemen on the other side if you think that is so, why are you making all this fuss? What difference does it make to you whom we nominate or what the platform is? And if you are going to beat us anyway, why not keep quiet? You remind me of the boy going through the graveyard, who whistled at the top of his lungs all the time, not because he wanted to whistle, but just for the purpose of keeping his courage up. That is why you talk so loud on the other side now. [Laughter.]

Mr. JAMES. Is it not true that these laboring men at this time are only able to keep up their wages by reason of their organizations, and not by reason of anything which has been done for their benefit by the Republican party?

Mr. BENNY. I will answer that question for the gentleman. In answer, Mr. Chairman, to the gentleman's question, I desire to say this: I firmly believe that, except in a very few instances, just enough to be the exceptions that prove the rule, no laboring man ever had his wages increased except as the result of united action of his fellows and himself in a union for their mutual advantage. The organization of labor into unions has increased the wages of all these men.

Mr. JAMES. Is it not further true if it were not for these organizations that the monopolies and trusts that have been created and fostered by the Republican party would have crushed the wages of the laboring men far below what they are now?

Mr. BENNY. It would have been so exactly; and I will give you for that the statement of Vice-President Warren of the Central Railroad Company of New Jersey. He was vice-president a few years ago. I was in the New Jersey legislature at the time when the railroad men of the State of New Jersey had a bill in that body similar to a bill which I am told was before Congress, and which was side tracked, for the purpose of compelling the railroad companies of the State to properly safeguard the passengers and employees on their railroads. The delegation from the union went over to see Vice-President Warren and ascertain what he was going to do about it, and this was his answer: "You fellows are getting too fresh. You always want something; if it isn't a raise in pay, then it is some improvement on the road. Now, let me tell you something. Inside of four years from now there will only be half a dozen railroad companies in this country, and inside of ten years from that time there will only be one. Then we will have you fellows by the short hair, where we ought to have had you long ago." That meant simply this: When all railroads are combined and owned by one company, that company with its great power would crush out the unions and have them at its mercy; but the time will never come when a company embracing all the railroads of the country can get the better of a union comprising all the men in its employ. The monopolies would do away with labor unions, and when you do away with the labor unions you will have no American labor, just a lot of white slaves to take the place of the black slaves.

Mr. BAKER. Does the gentleman forget that the policy of protection, as announced by its advocates, is for the purpose, the primary purpose, of enabling the manufacturers of this country, protected by the tariff, to pay high wages?

Mr. BENNY. I know that is the "announced" object of the tariff, but they do not do it, and let me show you how that works on the poor innocents. Here is a knife that I bought in New York at Christmas time for $3.25. I can buy the same identical kind of a knife, imported from Germany, down in the room below here—in the stationery room—for $1.86. I wanted to find out how it was that I could buy it there for $1.86 when I had to pay $3.25 for it in New York, and the answer was, "Uncle Sam does not have to pay any tariff."

Of course the object, as given to us by gentlemen on the other side, is to raise the wages of the employee. But it does not do that. The employee gets his wages raised when his union is strong and when the finances of the union are in good shape, and are lowered just as quickly as his union gets weak or the finances get low. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BENNY. I would like to get about ten minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in the power of the Chair to give the gentleman more time.

Mr. BENNY. Is the gentleman in charge of the bill on the Democratic side on the floor?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I yield ten minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. BENNY. The gentleman from Nebraska made a statement yesterday that every four years the Democrats have a new paramount issue, and that they do not dare to have the same issue that they stood on in any previous campaign. Let me ask the gentleman from Nebraska if there is not a different issue every day in this House? Is there not a different issue in every war? The issue in the war of 1776 was different from the issue in that of 1812, and by the war of 1846 another issue was decided, and again an entirely different one in the civil war, and a new one again in the war with Spain. There is nothing at all about that difference. Do not different issues come up? Different questions come up to-day from the issues that came up four years, eight years, or twelve years ago.

There will always be different issues, and let me suggest that you on your side can not say what the issues are to be, nor can we on this side reply that we will give you some other issue. The issues of any campaign are the questions which are most profoundly affecting the people at the time of the campaign, and this time you are going to have, perhaps, a different issue than you ever had before, because the situation is more acute. You point out to us here, day after day, the tremendous business done in the United States, both in imports and exports.

You are as proud of the fact as we are that the United States now has raised itself to the position of number one among the nations in the amount of its exports. We are delighted with that situation. But let me ask you this, who is getting the benefit of it? Do the laboring men who produce these things get it? Do the ordinary citizens receive it, or does it nearly all go into the pockets of a few men who have control, not only of the railroad lines of the country, but every great industry in the land? And there is another question in that connection that is going to come up in the next campaign. You can not keep it down. Neither could we if we wanted to do so.

This is the question: Are the railroad companies of the United States going to be permitted to go on as they have been doing for years past in their miserable freight discrimination, driving out of business one lot of men to make millionaires out of some others, favoring the Standard Oil Company and concerns of that kind, discriminating in favor of one set of men at the expense of other men who want to do business in opposition? You can no more dodge that issue in the next campaign than you can conduct your canvass in a flying machine. We are going to present that to the people of the land. Do you think you can escape discussing that as an issue by shouting "Hurrah for prosperity?"

And, in connection with that, the people of the country are asking to-day why the railroad companies in their freight discriminations are not hauled up by the President or by the legal department of the Government. Why is it not done? The answer which most of our people get is this: That the railroad companies "grease the ways" as they go. You get hurt anywhere by a railroad car or a trolley car, and you proceed to compel the company operating it to give damages for your injuries. The first thing you are apt to find is a judge on the bench with a pass from that company or some other company in his pocket. The man who serves the papers in the case often has a pass also, and some of the jurymen, perhaps, have passes in their pockets. Then how are you going to get equal and exact justice there?

The subsidizing of men in official station by railroad, telephone, telegraph, and other companies is now almost a national scandal, and you on the other side can not escape consideration of that when it is before the people by shouting "Down with free silver!"

Now, the point is made on the other side that in 1896 there were 3,000,000 men out of work. Do you not know that the man who makes up the statistics for this Administration and who favors it in every way he can, Mr. Carroll D. Wright, has said that there are a million men out of work now, and the number is increasing daily. The country right now is one-third as badly off, as far as the laboring men are concerned, as in the very worst time under President Cleveland.

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New Jersey yield?

Mr. BENNY. Certainly; I am always glad to do so.

Mr. LACEY. Did I understand the gentleman to claim that material in the way of stationery for the House is bought abroad and imported free of duty and sold to the Members free of duty?

Mr. BENNY. That is what I am told.

Mr. LACEY. The gentleman is certainly misinformed about that. No such arrangement has ever been made, and it is a proposition impossible on its face. The fact is we buy at wholesale and give the Members the benefit of the wholesale prices; but the goods are bought here, not abroad, and duties are paid on them if they are of foreign manufacture.

Mr. BENNY. I will say in answer that the knife I have here is a foreign-made knife. I priced it downstairs in the stationery room and was told that they could sell the same knife for $1.86, for the reason, as they said, that Uncle Sam did not pay duty. I want to say further that I do not think the United States Government, or whoever buys the material for the stationery room, buys one one-hundredth part as many knives as does the firm of John Curley in New York, where I bought this knife, one of the greatest cutlery concerns in the United States, if not the largest one.

Mr. BAKER. Does not the gentleman know that the foreigner pays the tax?

Mr. BENNY. Oh, no; I do not know that. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa if he thinks there could be a difference of $1.39 between the price of a knife in New York and the knife here if the tariff did not enter into it?

Mr. LACEY. Evidently the gentleman must have helped to pay the rent of the store in New York when he bought his knife. The expenses of operation there are a good deal more, and perhaps the retail rates are higher.

Mr. BENNY. Well, if the gentleman thinks that is a sufficient answer I am satisfied.

Mr. LACEY. I want to say this: Of course if you buy at retail you pay more than you would at wholesale, and if you buy in New York you perhaps pay more at retail than in other places. New York is not the cheapest place in the United States to buy goods at retail.

Mr. BENNY. One other question.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Let me say to the gentleman that in regard to the purchase of articles in the stationery room I have taken the pains to inquire, and they say that they not only never imported an article free, but that they never said that they did. On the contrary, the knives which the gentleman refers to and which they sell to Members I am told are all bought of an American trader who imports them. Now, I want to say to the gentleman from New Jersey that we are to-day selling a great many more knives and cutlery abroad than we are importing from abroad.

Mr. BENNY. That may be. Let me say to the gentleman from Ohio that I never said that the knife was bought abroad. It was made abroad and imported from abroad. The knife that I hold in my hand was bought in New York, but it was made abroad, and the same knife you can buy downstairs for $1.86 is made in the same place on the other side of the ocean.

Mr. GROSVENOR. But the gentleman gave as a reason that the price of the knife was so low in the stationery room was that Uncle Sam did not have to pay any duty.

Mr. BENNY. All I said was that I was told so. I do not know what Uncle Sam does; what I know is what the man told me. I was told that I could buy it cheaper downstairs, and when I asked how much I could buy a duplicate for he said $1.86. I said, "Why?" and he said, "Because Uncle Sam does not have to pay any duty."

Mr. GROSVENOR. Who said that?

Mr. BENNY. I do not know his name; I do not know the name of any man down there.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Is not this what the gentleman said, that "Uncle Sam charges no profit?"

Mr. BENNY. No; there was nothing said about Uncle Sam's profit. That is a good suggestion; the gentleman is an ingenious lawyer, and that is well put in.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am ingenious enough to say that when a young man makes a statement that I know is not true I would like to relieve him from the responsibility of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. BENNY. Will the gentleman yield me two more minutes?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I will provided the gentleman will not give it away to the other side. [Laughter.]

Mr. BENNY. Well, I think they need it. [Laughter.] Do not go away, General.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, no; the gentleman need not worry; I am not going away. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey is out of order in addressing a Member in that way.

Mr. BENNY. I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, if I was out of order; but I saw that the gentleman from Ohio was going away, and I did not know any other way to stop him. If I was out of order in calling him "General," I will withdraw it. Now, what I want to know is if the gentleman from Ohio means that I said anything that I knew was not true?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly not; I think the gentleman was misled.

Mr. BENNY. Does the gentleman not believe the statement was made to me downstairs?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Why, the word of the gentleman is unquestionably to be taken.

Mr. BENNY. Thank you. The gentleman is delightful. Now, Mr. Chairman, as I can not close in two minutes, I will ask that I may have permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BENNY. The gentlemen on the other side aver that there were more pianos, more carpets, more pictures in more homes in the United States last year than ever before—because of the Dingley tariff. I answer there were more babies born in this country last year and more deaths, too, than ever before. Is the Republican party responsible for the deaths and entitled to the credit of the babies?

Said the gentleman from Indiana: Just look at the increase in the production of nails in this country during the seven years of prosperity we have contributed. Year after year the quantity has increased tremendously and the price has fallen. When we stop to consider that an American workman turns out twenty-eight times as many nails per day as does the workman on the other side of the ocean, it is not to be wondered at that the number of kegs produced yearly has increased. This, of course, is due largely to improved machinery and better methods here. But who saw the American nail makers' wages go up to keep pace with the increased production?

But we are told that the bravery of Mr. Roosevelt is so great that all men should vote for him; that he "reached in" and settled the coal strike that threatened disaster to the land. When Mr. Baer, of "divine-right" notoriety, visited the President at the White House and roundly insulted him and told him to mind his own business and keep his hands out of the railroad and coal companies' affairs, why didn't he handle that president as Andrew Jackson did the United States Bank president who threatened him? Jackson's reply was, "By the Eternal, if you do, I'll hang you to yonder branch." Why didn't our President immediately cause proceedings, civil and criminal, to be taken against Mr. Baer for violation of the laws of the nation?

Mr. Chairman, your party can yell "Down with free silver!" and "Away with Bryan!" till it gets blue in the face without in the least altering the situation next November. You can not cry "Stop thief!" and have the people in the rôle of the policeman run away on a false trail. You can dodge and squirm all you please, but you must return again and again to these questions which the people insist shall be discussed and disposed of in this year of grace 1904, viz:

1. What of your stewardship? How have you exercised the responsibilities of power placed with you seven years ago?
2. Wherein is your candidate better or worse than he on the Democratic ticket?
3. What of the trusts? Are they to go on eating up the people and the fat of the land?
4. What of railroad freight discriminations and their effect upon our business men?
5. How about a proper modification of the tariff and the passage of laws so that our people may buy their own manufactures at home as cheap as the foreigner may purchase them abroad and may obtain the necessaries of life at a much lower figure?
6. Why have the wages of our workingmen been increased (your own Republican figures) only 12 per cent under this great prosperity you claim, while the cost of the workingmen's living has increased from 30 to 40 per cent?

And to these and other questions you must give answer, and that direct.

Mr. BEDE. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to make any remarks at this time or to occupy the attention of Congress at this session. I am altogether too modest to think that the country needs my counsel, but some of my friends have insisted that the world has been waiting too long to hear from me and that I should speak at this time. [Laughter.]

First, in reply—and all the reply I shall make—to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BENNY] is to pledge him that if he will get the Democrats to stop abusing Grover Cleveland I will induce the Republicans to stop abusing Bryan. They are both working for the interest of the Republican party and we can afford to make that promise.

I wish now formally to invite the Democratic party through its leaders in Congress to disband. I have been studying the interests of that grand organization for a long time. I find that as the factions of that party are lined up now neither can have a two-thirds vote in the next convention, and that therefore they can not nominate a candidate, and that the only safety for them is to disband and to come into the Republican ranks—to come in with the party that is doing things. Then at the end of four years they can go back without any rules, for if there is anything that ought to be unruled it is the Democratic party.

Thus they will get rid of their two-thirds rule by dissolution and can nominate a Presidential candidate in 1908, but to-day they are so torn with factions that they could not nominate a candidate if they went into a convention. Therefore, in their own interests, I ask them to come into our party, for they believe in everything that we believe in. I see Democrats looking in my face now who believe in the gold standard, who believe in expansion, who believe in the Panama Canal, who believe in everything that the Republican party is doing. Yet because of their environment or association or inheritance they are still voting the Democratic ticket, and they know not why.

Therefore, I repeat, I invite them to come into the Republican party and share in the blessings that we are scattering broadcast over the whole land. I think that more than 50 per cent of the Democrats in Minnesota believe in Theodore Roosevelt. I believe that the next election in Minnesota will give him at least 100,000 majority, and many of the votes cast for him will be Democratic votes.

I believe that if the Democrats should nominate Mr. Cleveland, or Mr. GORMAN, or some man representing that faction that even Mr. Bryan himself would cast his vote for Theodore Roosevelt. Why not, then, come in and make it an era of good feeling? These eras of good feeling, like panics, come and go at certain periods, and as we have not had one for about eighty years, I think it is the Democratic party's turn to come in with us this time and make another such an era, and also make my prophecies come true. Then, after another four years, they can segregate themselves, if they see fit, and organize their party anew.

I realize that we need two political parties in a great republic, and for that reason I am not here to say one word in censure of a man because he is a Democrat. If we were all Republicans or all Democrats to-day we would soon separate, because one element would be radical and the other conservative. And so it is quite the same thing to me if you call one man a "Republican" and another a "Democrat," as it would if you called one man a "conservative" and the other a "radical," though they belong to the same party.

Therefore, there is no quarrel between us, and as I have been teaching the doctrine of good will throughout the West I have come here now to teach it to you gentlemen on the other side. I wish to say that the only opposition I have heard to President Roosevelt is that which comes from a little bunch of Populists down in Wall street. [Laughter.] By Populists I mean people who deal in fiat. We contended against fiat in the West until we wiped it out. We went out when we saw a Populist and threw salt on his whiskers and caught him and brought him into the Republican ranks. [Laughter.]

We have wiped out Populism in the West, and it will soon be determined that this little bunch of Populists in Wall street can not dictate the nomination of either party. We have put 100 cents in every dollar of our money, and it is now time for them to put 100 cents of assets behind every dollar of the securities they are selling to the people. These men, I think, may be properly designated as pontoon patriots, who float their little paper ventures on unmeandered and boundless waters to nameless ports, and they may as well know now as at any other time that they can not defeat the renomination of Theodore Roosevelt next June.

They are making an effort to-day to create a sentiment throughout the West and make the people there believe that there is such opposition here that he will be defeated if renominated. They are trying to get an echo from the West, but the echo refuses to come back, and so the West will do its duty and the East will do its duty, and he will be triumphantly reelected. Therefore, I invite the Democrats, who are hopeless in this campaign, to come in and join us and make it unanimous, and make this campaign one grand sweet song throughout a happy land.

Mr. Bryan asks, "Why do you want to reorganize? What are you going to do when you get reorganized?" It is quite clear that neither one faction nor the other is going to win, and thus you will be torn with dissensions until you resolve to dissolve. It is a great deal better just to disband at once and come in and be a part of us. You will be far better off when you get through with the campaign if you will come in and vote the Republican ticket this year. You will get rid of all the isms that have been distracting your party so long. You have Johnsonism down in Ohio, though they got pretty well rid of that this year, and the only way to get rid of it is to do as the Ohio folks did last November, and do it plenty.

As you have done with Johnsonism in Ohio so you should do with Bryanism and all these other "isms" throughout the whole country, and when you have wiped them all out you can start in on the old basis, for we need the Democratic party in our business. No man ever made a harness without a hame strap and a hold-back strap. You need a breeching on your harness, especially when you are going down hill, and, as some cruel wit has said, the country is nearly always going down hill when you Democrats are in power. But we want you to reorganize on old lines and get together again, for nothing tends more to the safety of the country than to have two strong parties contending for supremacy.

And let me ask, Who is the leader of the Democracy to-day? No one on the other side of the House can tell. There is no recognized leader of that party. The distinguished gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], I admit, leads, and ably leads, his party in Congress. But his modesty as well as his geography prevents him from grasping the seats of the mighty and becoming a candidate for the Presidency at this time. So there is no leader; and because there is no recognized leader and you are rent in factions we urge you to come to us in your grief and let us solve your problems for you and bind up your wounds.

We have heard a great deal from pessimistic speakers on this floor about some organizations of wealth. No man, whether Republican or Democrat, believes in monopolies. But what are these great aggregations of wealth that we have to-day? What are they doing? Are they destroying the country, or are they adding to its happiness? Could you do the manufacturing business of the world to-day without these aggregations? Why, sir, fifty or a hundred years ago manufacturing was a simple thing.

At every crossroads was a shoemaker who made boots and shoes for the neighborhood; at the same crossroads was the blacksmith and the wagon maker who made the wagons and the farm implements for that community. They had no railroads then, and but little water transportation. The country was divided up into little communities, each working for itself. But now the world is changed. You have reached out. The old firm of Jones & Smith, or whatever it may have been, is not able to-day to do the business of the world. If you should cut down the aggregations of wealth which are conducting the great manufactures to-day, you would cut off all our foreign trade, because then we could not compete with the other nations of the earth.

I was in a great shoe factory up in New York State the other day. More than a hundred different people, aided by as many different machines, were each doing some little part of the work. No one was making a whole shoe. The old shoemaker, it is true, has been thrown out of employment and is perhaps not so happy as he was, for he may have been too old to learn a new trade. But shall the world stop while some fellow is learning how to "catch on?" Shall we not rather help him to "catch on" elsewhere while we go on building up these centers of wealth that are engaged in manufacturing, not alone for our own people, but for all the nations of the earth? Does any man believe that you could have the great locomotive that to-day aids in the transportation of the world if there were not millions of dollars somewhere engaged in the manufacture of that wonderful machine.

Can you go back to the conditions of fifty years ago and still have the blessings that you enjoy now? Why, sir, at that time $100 at a country crossroads was sufficient capital for the little manufacturing establishment. But now the same implements and many more—the fruits of American genius—are made at less cost on an infinitely larger scale, which requires a vast capital under a single roof with thousands of men. If you are going to have the civilization that we enjoy to-day, you must have aggregations of wealth conducting the manufactures of our country.

Fifty years ago there was none of the modern machinery that is used on the farm to-day. The cotton compresser was unknown at that time. You could not have that great machine if you had not large capital somewhere manufacturing it. The great farm implements that we use in the North were not known then because American genius had not invented them. But to-day they are known and are needed. If you cut off these aggregations of wealth and destroy them by means of the drastic legislation that I have heard suggested, you would do away with all the progress that has been identified with the past generation.

We have heard a great deal during the last few years—and I am not going back of 1896—on this silver question. In the campaign of 1896 a great many people told us that wheat and silver went together. They have not been going together very much since. I doubt very much whether they are going together anywhere.

Certain things have happened in the world that have affected both wheat and silver, things that had no necessary connection with each other. When we built the Pacific railroads through the Rocky Mountains we reduced the cost of producing silver and forever knocked out the previous ratio between the two metals. If you are ever going to get "sixteen to one" again, which Mr. Bryan asks to have reaffirmed in your platform, you will have to withdraw the railroads from the Rocky Mountains and repeal a generation of civilization. Whenever you do that you can have the old conditions, but not until then.

Why do I say that? Because 80 per cent of all the gold produced in the world requires no smelting—only 15 or 20 per cent requires smelting, and transportation has not seriously affected that question. But all the silver produced does require smelting, and therefore transportation has affected it. You have destroyed the ratio by the progress of civilization, and you can not get it back unless you give up the civilization you now enjoy.

About the same time you were building those railroads which have crossed the continent and reduced the cost of producing silver they were doing something over in Africa. They dug a canal—the Suez Canal down in Africa—that brought the Indian wheat fields 4,000 miles nearer to the markets of the world. The product of India was dumped upon the markets of Liverpool and thus brought into competition with the products of Minnesota.

Those two facts—the building of railroads in America and the building of canals in Africa—had a bearing upon the ratio between gold and silver and between wheat and silver that was not calculated on in the campaigns recently passed. A little study of history will tell you what it was that disturbed the ratio, and point out the only way that you can bring it back.

I have said that most of the Democrats were in favor of the Panama Canal, and I believe that with the digging of that canal and the development of waterways in the Southern States that the old South in the next generation will have a progress that it has never dreamed of. If we continue along the lines we have followed in the last generation the South will be the greatest beneficiary of Republican policies in the generation to come. Why, then, should you not accept my invitation to disband and help this good work on?

A great many people think, as some of our friends on the opposite side would have us believe, that the rich men own all the money of the world. Let me merely suggest that the poor men own the money and the rich men own the collateral, and that if you can frighten the poor men of the United States you can make hard times in ninety days. Ninety per cent of all the business men in the country are doing business on credit. They handle money, but they owe it. The poor man draws his wages and puts them in a bank, and he owns the money and it is his.

I was in the city of Cleveland last fall, and I found that one single savings bank had $46,000,000 in deposits; $46,000,000 in a single city in a single savings bank, and not the money of the rich, but the money of the toilers of that metropolis of Ohio. So it is all over our broad land. In every city you find in the banks the hoards of the poor, and not the hoards of the rich. And in ninety days, by disturbing the confidence of the poor and making them withdraw and hide their cash, you can bring a taste of the hard times that you had in 1893 and 1894 and 1895.

And let me say in passing that it does not make so much difference whether the tariff is high or low as it does whether it is stable. Stability makes business secure and the wages of the poor certain. Tariff agitation for a year or two in a political campaign, another agitation for a year or so before Congress meets and takes action, disturbs business beyond all description, and it seems to me that if the two political parties are wise in the future they will never make a national campaign on a question that is so closely connected with the business interests of the country. I believe the Republican party itself is wise enough to see when corrections are needed and to make them without agitation and with the full approval of the American people.

It may be that the people of my State in a little time will ask for some modification. There are some good people in Minnesota to-day who think that Canadian wheat ought to come "across lots" on its way to Europe. They feel that the tariff of 25 cents on wheat does not bring anything to our Treasury, and it keeps a great deal of business out of Minneapolis and Duluth. There is a great deal of that feeling in the North and West. Whether it will assert itself so formidably that it will ask action of the Republican party or not I can not surely say, but I believe it will do so very forcibly and very soon.

Because of our delay the Canadian people have builded within the last few years elevators with a capacity of 20,000,000 bushels on the north shore of Lake Superior, and are taking grain to Liverpool through Canadian territory that would naturally pass through our ports, and by the cost of transportation and the handling and insurance would leave millions of dollars among our people.

Let me say also that the State of Minnesota is changing from wheat growing to diversified farming. To-day we have more than 800 creameries within our State, and in another generation, unless through our agricultural experiments we can raise the yield of wheat from 15 to 25 bushels per acre, we shall cease to be a wheat-producing State. We hope to increase that average yield, but if we do not wheat will pass away from Minnesota as its principal product, for we can make more money at something else, and in another generation it will be a State of diversified farming; and if we shut out Canadian wheat the great flouring center that you have known at Minneapolis will have passed away forever.

In a very few years her mills will need the harder wheat of Canada to mix with the softer wheats grown farther south if we are going to make that a great flour-manufacturing center and let it have the supremacy that it has held for a generation. The handling of a hundred million bushels of Canadian wheat would mean at least $15,000,000 for the railroads; it would mean much more in the other industries that would be built up by the side of the great grain business in Minneapolis and Duluth, and, it is a subject worthy the serious consideration of the Republican party for the Canadian product will soon exceed those figures.

But I am not here to start an agitation upon the question. I feel that the tariff should not be a campaign issue; that it should be an issue among the party leaders; that they should know what is wisest and best for our country, and do it without long agitation and the disturbance of the business interests of our people.

I do not know what the leaders think about that because I have not consulted with them, but I believe that they will hear from the West upon that question, and when they do hear I think they will yield to the reasonable demands of our people. They can, at least, correct the present law, which requires our mills when grinding Canadian wheat in bond to ship the bran and all the other refuse out of the country. This is impracticable, and besides we need these by-products for feed for our stock in the West. But enough of this for the present.

A great many Democrats—and I see some facing me that I think a great deal of—are afraid of what is going to happen in this country. Let me assure them that nothing is going to happen very serious very soon. I want to congratulate the Democratic party itself on some improvements that it has made. I was glad to find when I entered Congress for the first time this year that the Democrats of Ohio had made a vast improvement in exchanging the honorable Mr. Lentz for Judge BADGER of that State. [Laughter.] That seems to me one of the greatest improvements their party has made within my memory.

A great many Democrats are afraid that we are going to have an empire here. They are going to try to make that one of the issues of the next campaign. They tried to make it one before. Mr. Bryan said, in his speech in New York the day before yesterday, that he greatly regretted the people did not take to that issue, and he will strive to keep that as a party issue. But, gentlemen, we have been getting rid of empires ever since we were a Government. One by one we have driven them off the continent.

You remember that we had a dispute with the King of England for a few years, and he let go of this part of the world and went away. Then we are soon to celebrate the purchase of Louisiana Territory from the first consul and soon-to-be Emperor of France. We got rid of his dominion upon this continent. It has been the policy of our people that they do not want an empire here. We bought Florida, and got rid of more empire. We took Texas as a slice of Mexico, and got California and all that territory to the westward, and gradually got rid of the Spanish Empire. Then we continued by purchasing Alaska from Russia, and got rid of another empire.

And again, looking out across the Pacific, we saw Queen Lil on her throne. We told her to "come off," and we took her little country in and have given liberty to her people. So, one by one, we have been getting rid of empires, and we are not going to make one of our country. Why, when our Government was formed our fathers hardly dared to leave the selection of President, Senators, and Representatives to the people. For many years the Congressmen fixed the nominations for President. The people would not permit that to-day.

In all our history we have been steadily tending toward a government immediately in the hands of the people. Out in the State of Minnesota we are coming, through our educational system of uplifting the common people, to the point that they understand quite as well as you or I what is the best interests of this country. We are now beginning there what I think our southern brethren should begin soon—the consolidation of the country schools. We are taking half a dozen country districts and uniting them into graded schools, and we shall soon be teaching agriculture in them also.

The man who teaches a graded school in the country can have his little farm by the side of the schoolhouse, and agriculture can be taught while he is teaching the literary branches. And soon it will be possible for every boy and girl in Minnesota to secure a graded school education without leaving the parental roof. When this system is adopted by the whole country, North and South, East and West, you will find there will be no danger of making an empire of our country, and every Democratic fear will be allayed.

But instead of making an empire we shall set, as we have ever set, an example to the other peoples of the earth in the building of republics. I know that some object even to that. Gentlemen on the other side have said that the President acted a little too quickly on the Isthmus, in doing what everybody wanted done, and incidentally giving aid and comfort to a Republic. Yet there is not a Democrat on this floor who, if he had the casting vote, would not give that vote for the approval of the Panama treaty and the building of the canal. The only objection I have ever heard raised to it was that by digging a canal we would let the two oceans into a combine, but that is not a very serious objection. [Laughter.]

I realize that it is pretty hard work for a Democrat to leave his party, and in extending this formal invitation to him to come into the Republican party and be one of us, I know how hard it is for him to do it. There is a little railroad down in southern Minnesota, in a district represented by one of my colleagues, a few miles long, with a daily mixed train that always gets to its destination too late for a connection.

A lady who was riding on this train one day complained to the conductor that the train was going too slow, and, finally, after many importunities, asserted that she could walk faster than the train was going. The conductor retorted by asking her why she did not get off and walk, and she said that she would do so, but her people would not be looking for her until the train got in. [Laughter and applause.] So I realize how hard it is for the Democrats to get out and walk faster than their party is going, as nobody will be looking for them; but nevertheless I extend the invitation in the kindliest spirit and with no feeling of hate.

I was indeed a little sorry that we could not have leaders in this House upon the different sides both from one section of the country. In my reading of history I remember that a gentleman from the South has always been pitted against a gentleman from the North, and my only regret is that the leader on the Republican side and the leader on the Democratic side were not both from the North or both from the South, that we might wipe out these old sectional differences and forget them for evermore. Sometimes, unfortunately, the mere fact that the leaders live in these sections arrays the people behind them against each other, and I would gladly remove even this seeming hostility.

And now, in spite of all the pessimistic speeches we have heard, I wish to suggest that the world is getting better and brighter all the time. The conditions which existed a generation ago would not be tolerable now. You are raising more cotton in the South than you did with slave labor before the war, and you do not want to go back to that. The conditions in the South are happier to-day than ever before.

We heard some debate upon that yesterday, and while there may be some difference of opinion, I think if we throw all partisanship aside everyone will admit that the South is happier and more prosperous and her joy fires burning brighter to-day than ever before under any condition or under any party.

Surely the North is more prosperous than it was ever before; the volume of our manufactures is greater, our consumption at home is greater, our exports abroad are greater than they were ever before, and the people are happier because everybody is prosperous, thus bringing equality of condition, and the real secret of happiness is, in my judgment, this equality of all the people; and one of the reasons why the people of the North are a little happier than the people of the South is that there is more feeling of equality between all the people and less distinction, due, perhaps, to a more universal prosperity, and you can never have true happiness except where there is that feeling of equality toward the fellows with whom you associate.

This feeling of equality is the sweetest happiness, and through the prosperity that we have experienced in the last six or eight years we have lifted up the laboring man until he has sufficient means to be on an equality with all of his fellows, even with his employer, and——

Mr. SCUDDER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEDE. Certainly.

Mr. SCUDDER. I would like to ask the gentleman whether that feeling of equality could possibly prevail where the races are different?

Mr. BEDE. I could not hear the gentleman.

Mr. SCUDDER. I would like to ask the gentleman whether that feeling of equality to which he has made reference is possible where the races are different? I ask whether it could, in his opinion?

Mr. BEDE. Well, I would hardly try to settle the race problem here to-day.

Mr. SCUDDER. I thought the gentleman was touching upon it.

Mr. BEDE. No, no; I did not. While my words might seem to refer to that, I did not mean to do so. I realize the South has certain troubles of her own. We know that peculiar institutions make peculiar burdens. For a few hundred years a certain part of our country had a peculiar institution that has brought its own peculiar burdens which they of that section must needs bear. I for my part will never add one feather weight to the burden which is resting upon them. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And I have only invited you into the Republican party that we might help you to solve that problem along with all the rest. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I think I have been in every Southern State. I have met a great many Southern people. I know they are good people; and if they were not, I would not invite them into the Republican party. The very fact that I invite them is an assurance that I believe they are the right kind of folks.

Mr. THAYER. Our good friend has been inviting the Democrats to join the Republican party. I want to ask him if he is led to that desire from fear that a large part of the Republicans will vote against the stagnant party, the "stand pat" party, in the next Presidential election and come over with the progressive Democratic party?

Mr. BEDE. I would ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whom he is going to nominate? [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. SCUDDER. That is going to be decided by the Democratic convention.

Mr. THAYER. I should be pleased to answer the gentleman if I had the power in my hands to nominate, but in the Democratic party we have no bosses; we have no one man who nominates the President.

Mr. BEDE. Mr. Chairman, I live in a State in which they nominate Congressmen by primaries, where all the people have a vote as to who shall be Congressman. I understand there is a certain section of the Democratic party in New York where Congressmen are sent to Washington by appointment. [Laughter on the Republican side.] I understand there are certain others of this House that would try to exclude a great many people from the right of suffrage. I never heard of a Republican introducing a bill to repeal the thirteenth, fourteenth, or fifteenth amendment.

Now, I am not going to say whether these amendments were right or wrong when they were passed. I am merely going to say to you that we elected a President that was taken away from us in 1865, and we might have done differently or have done the same thing in a better way had he lived; but the Republican party believes that even if mistakes have been made the best way to right them is to go ahead and not to back up.

As I have already intimated, it is far from my heart to say one word that would be a burden to gentlemen from the Southern States. I know we have had a great many people in Minnesota from the South, not alone from Southern States like Virginia—my predecessor in this House was from that State. We have had good friends from Missouri, too. We had friends from Missouri who came up there and introduced the Missouri system of finance. [Laughter.]

They distributed money on horseback, and we kept them there for twenty-five years. [Renewed laughter.] We do not let any Missourians get away when they come to us with malice aforethought. We have a sort of hospitality and try to keep them there, and try to reciprocate the kindness that we know would be extended to us in that great Commonwealth, one of the best and one of the most abused States in the Union.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. BEDE. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What did you do with the mayor of one of your great cities in Minnesota? Is he in for twenty-five years or for life? [Laughter.]

Mr. BEDE. He is not in yet, and I hope he is innocent. He was recently a Democrat and had been a Republican only for six months when he was convicted. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That shows what a good man does when he gets into bad company. [Laughter.]

Mr. BEDE. We hadn't had time to reform him.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield in a good-natured way?

Mr. BEDE. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. How much advantage has the gentleman over this mayor that he refers to?

Mr. BEDE. Let me say to the gentleman, and to this side of the House as well, that the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. HEPBURN, received my first vote in the campaign of 1880. I want to admit frankly, and you will see it in my biography in the Directory, that I voted the Democratic ticket a few times, and I know how hard it is. [Laughter.] My first vote and my last vote were Republican, but in the meantime I voted the Democratic ticket, and it is necessarily the mean time when you do a thing like that. [Great laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Instead of that being a mean time for the gentleman, wasn't it a tolerably good time? Wasn't he United States marshal during that time?

Mr. BEDE. I was United States marshal for a very few months. I served during the war of the strikes in 1894, and then resigned, a thing which proves that I was not a real Democrat. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have been saying a great many things. I came here with no set talk to make, and had not intended to take up the time of the House. But let me add that the Democratic party has been reaching out for the Populist vote of the West, while often ridiculing the Populists, and yet they speak, as the gentleman recently did speak on this floor, of our abusing Mr. Bryan. I read in a Democratic paper in St. Louis not many years ago of a Populist convention, and that paper described the Populists as "an aimless and useless caterwampus of nincompoopic gabsquirts and rapscallions." [Laughter.]

We have never said anything so mean against anybody that we have been trying to get into our party, and I shall not say anything so mean against any gentleman on that side of the House or any man that you may seek to nominate as a Presidential candidate for your party. I know Mr. Bryan personally and well, and have the highest regard for him. I believe that he is sincere, and all the more dangerous because he is sincere. I know Mr. Cleveland fairly well. I think he is one of the great men of the country.

I believe that ultimately his Administration will be looked upon as one of the best in our history, though it is one that the Democrats themselves now abuse the most. Now, if I am willing to forgive both Mr. Cleveland and Mr. Bryan, will you Democrats do as much? [Laughter on the Republican side.] I want this to be an era of good feeling. I want you to love one another and to love us, and stop sitting up nights hating each other in your own party. We do not do that out in Minnesota. To be sure, we have pretty long days in the summer, and the sun sits up nights to shine for the farmers up there and does help a little bit in the prosperity, I admit; but it is due largely to the Republican policies that help the sunshine. [Laughter.]

Besides, we have got improved machinery out there. I remember distinctly as a boy on the Western Reserve in Ohio that they used to cut their grain with a scythe and with an old-fashioned cradle and a sickle. We do not do that now. You can not sell anything to a farmer in Minnesota that he can not sit down on. [Laughter.] Things are coming our way.

I saw a farmer in the district of the chairman of this committee [Mr. TAWNEY], in the southern portion of Minnesota, a year or so ago, who was out cultivating his corn along the roadside, and one of the rural mail carriers, on a route the gentleman from Minnesota had had established, came along and handed the farmer his morning paper and his letters as he was cultivating his crop. He had an umbrella or a sort of canopy over his cultivator, and he went along reading his newspaper and cultivating his mind while he was cultivating the soil, and that is why you get that sort of a gentleman from that sort of a district. [Laughter and applause.]

I am only asking you Democrats to be full-fledged Americans; just to come in out of the wet while you wait, and be like us. Out in the West I saw a few years ago a little party of gentlemen talking of their different nationalities, for we have everything there, and among the gentlemen was a Scotchman, an Englishman, a German, an Italian, and finally they came to one fellow who said that he was a Norwegian, but that he had been "neutralized." [Prolonged laughter.]

I am willing you should be Democrats if you will just be "neutralized," just be full-fledged Americans and belong to the whole country. Once upon a time I know there was a little difference between the North and the South, and then every relative I had on earth over 18 years of age was in the Union Army. My good old father is sleeping over here in Arlington to-day, but that does not make me hate any man that comes from the South.

The statute of limitations has run on that business, so far as I am concerned, and I am willing to take you into full fellowship just to let you disband and get rid of your two-thirds rule, and in four years come out and elect for President the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], if you can. I want to find some way to promote him. [Laughter and applause.] And the world is not so bad as it has been pictured by some of those boys who were talking recently. When they have lived longer they will see things differently.

I used to think sometimes myself that things were not just right, and I have not the slightest doubt now that I could run this country better than it ever was run, but there are a lot of you fellows who will not let me have my own way, so I have to compromise with about 80,000,000 people, and it is pretty hard to lead the country exactly right when one is compromising with so many. But there will be no danger to the country while I am here in Congress. I won't let anything happen on this side. [Applause and laughter.]

So throw away your fears and throw away all those old socialistic doctrines that you can not put in practice here. We have got to run the Government, and to do so we must have five or six hundred millions of dollars a year, or else we can not go down South and scoop out the rivers that are too shallow and bank up those that are too deep. We are doing everything that you want us to do, and we can not do it without an abundant revenue, and while you are putting on that abundant revenue let us put it on where it will do the American laborer the most good. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The world in a sense is smaller than it ever was. Did you ever stop to think of that? I see a gentleman here from Louisiana. Now, when the battle of New Orleans was fought down in his State in 1815 peace had been declared for two weeks in Europe, and the world had not heard of it this side of the Atlantic, and we could have gone on killing Englishmen for a couple of months before the news got here. It does not travel that way now.

In 1898, when Dewey lined up his ships for battle in Manila harbor, I am told that fact traversed 20,000 miles, over continents and under seas, and was ticked into the White House here in Washington in just thirty-five minutes. The world in one way is getting smaller, and we are getting closer together, and our country is becoming a world power with interests common to all mankind. Just at the close of the Spanish war a friend of mine, who was rather opposed to expansion, was going from Paris to Rome on a modern railroad train—made in America, under our Republican industrial system, by the way, and shipped across the ocean—and on that train he fell in with General Garibaldi, of Italy, a gentleman he thought was a Scotchman at first by his conversation; and in talking over American affairs and our victory Garibaldi asked what America was going to do now.

My friend did not know. He was pretty modest, as every American was before the Spanish war. But General Garibaldi said, "You have become a world power, whether you will or not." Said he, "There is not a meeting of a cabinet in a capital of Europe but the first question asked on any subject that arises is, What will the United States of America say about it?" They can not do business unless they know what our opinion is. The thought of America is to-day dictating the political thought of the world. We have lifted our standard higher than any other nation, and we are teaching other nations how to lift theirs. [Applause.]

We erected a Republic here; and Mexico followed; and the States of Central and South America followed Mexico. Then we threw the Monroe doctrine around them; and Monroe was a pretty good Democrat. And as we had "an era of good feeling" under Monroe, why can you not come in now and make "an era of good feeling" under Roosevelt? Just make it unanimous this year for once! [Laughter.] You have not done anything so remarkable or significant in a long while. It will rid you of all your bitterness and save you a lot of medicine.

Get all this vinegar out of you. Come in, and we shall have the jolliest time in this Congress that you ever knew. And then four years from now you can segregate yourselves and select a leader that is a leader. Let us not have any dispute over the silver or gold standard, because that question is academic. The world has moved along. The gold standard is here to stay, whether Mr. Bryan wills it or not.

Just come in and be good natured about it. Do not make any more of these bitter speeches. It does not pay. They may read well down in the South, just as some bitter speeches on our side may read well in the North. But they will not read well after a while. They may be "a good enough Morgan for the campaign," but that is not the kind of stuff to educate young America on.

It seems to me that the interests of this country are too great to permit us to give up our time to these petty wrangles, and I look forward with impatient joy to that good time coming when all these little whirlpools of earthly hate shall be lost in the great ocean of God's love. There are other points that I would like to raise, but I see my time has been exhausted.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Go ahead, you can have all the time you want.

Mr. BEDE. Thank you. I would like to suggest to this House, not alone to one side of it, that the Monroe doctrine to which I have referred is just as big as the United States Navy, and no bigger. [Applause on the Republican side.] If you should destroy our Navy to-day you would have no Monroe doctrine to-morrow. If you build up the Navy you extend the Monroe doctrine, and you can do as you will with it.

I believe that the policy of this nation, if we are to be a great nation among the others of the world, is to have such a Navy as will enforce those laws that we have laid down, or else withdraw the law and not pretend to its enforcement. I am not pretending to say how much this House or any House shall spend for that purpose; but I am here to say that the people of the West stand for that thought; that they are willing you should do whatever is reasonable to help to make this the greatest nation in the world, as we think our State is the best, if not the greatest, in this Union.

I may be excused if I tell some of my friends here that we have a school fund of $15,000,000 in our State that we use in the manufacture of citizens; $15,000,000 with which we are buying the bonds of other States, invested in a permanent school fund. I would that every State of the South had as simple a problem in the education of its youth, black and white, as we have in our great Commonwealth. I know that you have the double standard of schools down there, and must needs have it. I would that your burdens were lighter than they are, and that your progress might be greater; but I urge again that the next quarter century under Republican policies will give to the South more progress than it has known in the last hundred years.

You were devastated by a civil war; you have had the burden of two races to educate and to uplift. One generation has passed away, and you are only now coming into your inheritance. We want to build the Panama Canal to help you, and yet your party at the other end of the Capitol is holding it back. Why not pass the treaty and have the work begun? When we first talked of that canal it was to be built so that the Pacific coast States could get to Europe; but the Senate has been talking, and now we are going to dig the canal so that the Atlantic States and the South can get to the Orient. The world has turned around while the Senate has been talking about these things. [Laughter.]

We have been trying to help you for a long time, but you refused to be helped. Now, go to your friends and tell them to pass that treaty. Tell them to let the work begin, to let Republican progress march on, and it will be for the uplifting of your States more than it will for mine. The South has more at stake in the Panama Canal than any other part of the Union. The city of New York, the city of Baltimore, and a few Atlantic coast towns are the only ones that have any great interest in it, and we are doing it because we believe that it is necessary for the progress of the nation, and incidentally for the uplifting of the commerce of the South.

I look for that time when New Orleans will be one of the great cities of our continent, perhaps the greatest exporter upon our continent. I look for Mobile to have a marvelous growth, and the building of that canal and the development of the Mississippi may reach in its blessings to St. Louis, and perhaps through the drainage canal even to Chicago itself. And when all these plans for progress have been carried out the South will then approve of Republican policies, and it might just as well come in and vote for them now. [Laughter.]

Oh, we have heard some very pessimistic talk from the other side, but the world is not very bad after all. I have heard fellows find fault before. I met a friend of mine once who was kicking very hard. He had just came out of a saloon. He told me he had been buying some lining for his underclothes. [Laughter.] Why, he said:

That his horse went dead and his mule went lame,
And he lost six cows in a poker game;
Then a hurricane came on a summer day
And blew the house where he lived away;

And an earthquake came when that was gone
And swallowed the land that the house stood on.
Then the tax collector, he came 'round,
And charged him up with the hole in the ground.

[Laughter.]

He thought that was carrying the single tax a little too far. [Laughter.] But if you could analyze his case, and analyze the case of all complainers and kickers, you would find that out of a hundred of them at least ninety ought to go out and kick themselves. They do not improve the opportunities they have, the opportunities that lie at their doors.

I have had occasion to go out in my State to induce the farmers to build creameries. It is sometimes the hardest thing in the world to induce people to do the thing that is for their own interest. I have gone into little places in the backwoods where they kept two or three cows, and set the milk on a shelf in the living room, where they discussed Democratic politics and chewed tobacco, and did a lot of things. And when they brought their butter into town you could taste every member of the family. [Great laughter.]

They did not meet halfway the opportunities that they had. That is the complaint I have against you Democrats over there. You have now an opportunity and a cordial invitation to vote the Republican ticket, and you refuse. You have an opportunity to upbuild the South and make it as prosperous as Pennsylvania and Ohio, and you decline to do so. I sincerely hope that in another generation there will be more spindles in the Southern States than in all the rest of the world. I want to see every waterfall in Dixie turning spindles and giving employment to blacks and whites alike. [Loud applause.]

I want to see you so prosperous that you will indorse what I am saying now. [Laughter.] Why, when I hear one of those Democratic speeches it reminds me of an incident that occurred once in a little western town where a "Mr. Day" was wedded to a "Miss Week," and a great many people regretted the loss of time. [Laughter.] But a country editor who had a penchant for poetry removed all sorrow, if he did not dry every eye, with the lines:

A Week is lost; a Day is gained, but why should we complain,
For soon there will be Days enough to make the Week again.

[Great laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. BEDE. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. On behalf of the history of literature, I would like to have it go into the RECORD that George D. Prentice was the author of those immortal lines.

Mr. BEDE. I am glad to pay any tribute to the memory of George D. Prentice, and may every Democrat be as happy as he. I know that the Democratic party needs a good deal of my advice. [Laughter.] I have given it a great deal in my own State when I belonged to it [laughter] and when I did not. And I think I can speak more convincingly, as I can more impartially, than if I did not know the burden of its song.

It is hard for the Southern people to vote the Democratic ticket and at the same time to believe in the gold standard; to believe in the Monroe doctrine that we are carrying out; to believe in the Panama Canal; to believe in our expansion policy in the Philippines, and to believe in protection, as many of them do. I have talked with business men in New Orleans and in Mobile who believe on all these questions as I do, but when it comes to election they do not vote as I do. This, I think, is due to their environment, and I am willing to go down there and help them to change things. I would that the South might enjoy every blessing known to the people of my State. You, gentlemen, are bearing your own peculiar burdens, and it is perhaps not practical for the Federal Government to do anything to aid you in this.

That progress is most secure which we achieve for ourselves. But I do feel, as one of our writers has said, that "he serves his country best who joins the tide that bears her nobly on," and it is the Republican party that bears it on to-day. Without bitterness, without upbraiding, without condemning you for the past, or blighting your hopes for the future, I merely ask you to come in to the enlarged blessing that we so richly enjoy and avoid the useless expense of a campaign this year. [Laughter,]

You can not elect anything. [Laughter.] It is no use trying that. There are a few people, as I said in New York, who want a President that will let them "do" folks, but we insist upon a President that will let us do things. We are going to get our kind of a President and are willing you should share in the triumph. We are going to carry the Eastern States, as we have always done. We are going to carry the West, because we can not help it. The election there will be nothing but a supplementary census. [Laughter.] That Bureau, you know, has become permanent now. So there is no use of all the expense and worry and trouble on your part without any results, and therefore I close as I began, by extending to you this sincere and formal invitation to disband and come into our ranks.

I do not wish to say one word that would give you sorrow. I feel that the stars and bars of the old Confederacy, justly preserved as the fondest heirloom of a proud and gallant people, to be kissed and caressed by loving generations yet unborn, became a thousand times more sweet when, as an emblem of earthly power, baptized in flame and embalmed in pathetic story, it was furled forever.

And now another and more beautiful flag floats over every foot of our broad land and over a myriad islands of the sea. Beginning with thirteen feeble colonies, it has extended its domain to forty-five great and powerful States, and Old Glory grows brighter and brighter in the sweet radiance of its own gathering stars. [Applause.]

We invite you to share its blessings with us in the fullest measure, and to—

> Stand by the flag, all doubts and dangers scorning;
> Believe, with courage firm and faith sublime,
> That it shall float until the eternal morning
> Pales in its glories all the lights of time.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. GROSVENOR having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. BARNES, one of his secretaries.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON].

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I shall claim the attention of the committee but a few minutes, and that on a certain line of thought. I am unwilling, Mr. Chairman, for the opportunity to pass and fail to put on record the facts and the incidents connected with the prosperity of the South that made it possible for the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL] to tell the beautiful tale, as he poetically names it, "The story of the South." Mr. Chairman, I concur in every word that the gentleman from Illinois said relative to the prosperity of the South, taken, though, as he said it was, and made up by the work of the "scissors and the paste pot." I believe, Mr. Chairman, that this prosperity had better be told by the facts and incidents that come from the growth of the great manufacturing, agricultural, mineral, and timber interests of the South.

I say I believe that those facts can better be told and understood by referring to these matters than taken from editorials in newspapers. No man on this floor responds more cheerfully and more cordially than I do to the liberal, noble, and patriotic sentiments that the accomplished gentleman so sincerely uttered when he said that he was glad to know that the bitterness and acrimony that were produced years ago by our great civil conflict had passed away. That sentiment finds a hearty response with the people of the South. I stood not many months since upon that bloodiest battlefield of the South—the battlefield of Chickamauga—and I read there the beautiful and patriotic inscriptions that the different States of the North and South had made, commemorative of the magnificent and glorious deeds of their noble sons, and I wondered if there was a patriotic American who could read those inscriptions and not feel a proud inspiration that it was a splendid tribute to American courage.

I believe in that sentiment, and I say now to the distinguished gentleman from Illinois that the "story" of the prosperity of the South has been whispered for years into the hearts of the watchful, patient, and long-suffering people of the South and given to them a gladness, courage, and hope that they have never realized before. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to discuss the hackneyed and worn subject of the race problem, save as logically connected with the industrial growth of the South. I believe even now that too much has been said on that subject of a sectional partisan character. "Let us alone" in the South, and so far as the logic of our industrial progress and improvement and development is concerned we will settle peaceably, quietly, that great question. I hope there is no gentleman on either side of this Chamber who feels otherwise than that this question, called the "negro problem," ought to be settled peaceably, quietly, and with due regard to the material interests of the South and the peace of the country at large. That which I will mention first leads me to believe that the progress, development, and growing industrial interests of the South is fast settling that question.

No man doubts the fact that when the negro becomes a very small minority in the South and white people take his place in the workshops, the mines, and the cultivation of the lands, that that is a long step in the direction of settling the so-called "negro problem." Now, what are the facts about this? What is it that has contributed an important part to this wonderful prosperity, present and future, in the South? I am glad, Mr. Chairman, yes, I rejoice, to be able to stand here and say that in my humble opinion the South to-day stands upon the threshold of a greater growth and prosperity than the most favored section of the world has ever realized. We feel it in the atmosphere. We see it in the unequaled opportunities and advantages that the South holds out to the world for profitable investment. The attention of the whole country—yes, even of the world—is fixed on our section. This means immigration will follow, and has now set in. All of this points to commercial supremacy. The first significant fact that I call the attention of the committee to is this: Go to the last census, and what startling fact do you find there? There were 24,500,000 acres of tillable land in the South that was cultivated in the twelve months preceding the publication of the census.

How was it cultivated? Who did it? It speaks more than volumes can tell of the wonderful changes that are going on in our industrial interests in the South. Out of that 24,500,000 acres of tillable cotton land, white men cultivated and raised cotton on 14,000,000 acres of it; 5,000,000 were cultivated by what were known as "managers" who employed negro labor. Is not that a significant fact? Is it not more than a whisper in the ear as to the progress and development of the South, a wholesome change in our condition, and a certain solution of this vexed question of the negro problem? The idea and theory that worthy, good, intelligent and respectable white people will not and can not cultivate and make cotton and that negro labor alone can make cotton cultivation a success is forever exploded. The South is tired and wearied with the continued agitation of domestic questions calculated and intended to disturb the friendly relations between the white people of the South and the negro. We welcome this movement so auspiciously commenced to have white people cultivate the farming lands of the South. We say this in no spirit of hostility.

It is a change the significance of which ought to attract the attention and approval of every patriotic man, North and South. And, as suggested just now, we of the South have that question in our own hands. We are more interested in the peaceable and quiet solution of it than any other section of the Union. In that connection I will take occasion to read a few clippings from great and influential northern newspapers that indicates what the trend of public opinion in the North is in this great matter. It shows how public opinion is working on it. I read from the Philadelphia Record, a conservative, able, and leading newspaper, published in the great "city of brotherly love"—Philadelphia—and no sail catches more quickly and thoroughly the sentiment of the people than a great leading newspaper. Listen:

> The move in Maryland to disfranchise negroes, following upon disfranchisement in Virginia, is not without peril to the people of Pennsylvania if, as a result of it, there shall be a further African invasion of this State. Our heavy negro vote is already a political misfortune, contributing potentially toward the continuance of misgovernment. It is also an undeniable fact that the safety of life and property has been put at greater hazard in the southern and eastern counties of Pennsylvania by the drift northward of an undesirable negro element. It is quite possible that in the near future the people of this State may be obliged to take measures to protect themselves against further African intrusion.

That is ominous, yet how true! "Take measures to protect themselves against African intrusion," says the Record. I do not say in any spirit of levity that the trouble heretofore on this subject with northern people is that distance gave enchantment to the negro. The question is drawing near to them now; and when it does they will solve it in the best way for the interests of themselves, their families, and their States, just like the South is doing to-day.

Why, then, should the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS] complain so lustily, as he did in his remarks on the floor yesterday, about the constitutions of the different States in the South in seeking to protect themselves from that very element of citizens of which the Record says, "Our heavy negro vote is already a political misfortune, contributing potentially toward the continuance of misgovernment." Learn first to pluck the beam from your own eye, and then you can see more clearly to pluck the mote out of your brother's eyes. I say this in the kindliest spirit. This is a question that we ought to discuss free from partisanship or prejudice.

Now I will read another paragraph. I admit, Mr. Chairman, that the people of the South owe a debt of gratitude to the negro that we can never fully repay until the last old antebellum negro in the South has disappeared. We feel that and recognize it. Here is another item from the Pittsburg Dispatch. This, too, is a powerful public organ in shaping public opinion and in reflecting it:

> The vast majority of the negroes, especially those raised in the North, are law-abiding and honest; but it does seem when, whether through lack of training or for some other deficiency, a negro goes wrong his temperament leads him into a recklessness and flagrancy of crime that has few parallels, and suggests a reversion to savagery. We emancipated the negroes over a generation ago; but we are confronted with the question whether as a nation we were careful enough to provide them with the moral education necessary to preserve them from relapse into ignorance of all moral laws.

"His temperament leads him into a recklessness and flagrancy of crime that has few parallels," etc.

Why, Mr. Chairman, what severer criticism could I make on the negro than that? I refer to it simply to show that there is a drift of public opinion on this subject that will soon relegate the negro question to the shades of the rear.

These are the sentiments coming from the leading newspapers of the North, and my judgment is that to-day we recognize that the conservative public sentiment of the North stands strongly disposed to let this question alone, and let the South solve its own problem for itself. They realize that they have in the North a problem to settle far greater than the South has in the settlement of the negro problem.

Mr. BOUTELL. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. With pleasure.

Mr. BOUTELL. I would like to ask whether in the opinion of the gentleman the tide of European immigration that almost always follows great prosperity in any section of the land will not naturally tend to the South, and perhaps, as we all hope, in a few years settle this question naturally?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I say that it not only tends to go there, but it is actually going there now; and I am here to-day speaking more as an immigration agent for the South than in any other capacity. I believe that when the white people commence to raise cotton and explode the old idea that nobody but a negro can raise it—that when that takes place the negroes will necessarily be scattered throughout the whole country and immigration will come bountifully into the South.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. There is an immigration coming into the South, but it is coming mainly from the Middle West and the Northwestern States. In Louisiana there has been some immigration of Italians, mainly from middle Italy. They have made certain parts of Louisiana in the sugar belt bloom like a rose garden, cultivating the very ditches and banks, and getting much more out of the land for everybody, as well as for themselves, than the incompetent negro population has ever been able to do. We do not apprehend very much from the European immigration generally. We expect that other immigration agents from other sections frighten them off with statements about the negro population. But we are getting a magnificent class of men from Iowa, Michigan, Wisconsin, Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio, and these men, I am glad to say, within two or three years after they get there, whether Democrats or Republicans, are Southerners to the backbone, and more ultra than are our own people in the Southern States to-day.

Mr. BOUTELL. May we not hope to encourage the European immigration?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. So that we get honest, good, patriotic, intelligent citizens for our country, let them come from wherever they may. I will tell you the fact, Mr. Chairman, in reference to these white men cultivating 14,500,000 of tillable acres in the South, has been to drive the negro to the cities and towns and there to become vagrants and criminals. No man will understand me as including all negroes in that class. It would be untrue and unjust for me to do so. We have a large number of worthy, intelligent, respectable negroes who spurn and condemn the vagrant and criminal class of their own race and do not associate with them. This class of negroes are respected by all the people of the South.

It is for that reason that the South has taken such a strenuous position on the subject of vagrants being allowed to vote.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, does not the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON] believe that the holding of a large per cent of the population in the position of serfs rather than of citizens drives away, in point of fact, the intelligence and valuable emigration from Europe? Is it not a fact that the discrimination by law against the citizenship of the colored man is one of the strong obstacles in the way of the coming to the South of the immigration that has been coming to this country that is valuable—the German, and especially the Scandinavian? Now, one other thing. These people who are going from Ohio and Michigan and so forth into the South are going there, are they not, simply to develop your resources with their money; and is it not a fact that the population coming from these States, which the gentleman has enumerated, into the Southern States, are going there by reason of the purchase of timber, as in the State of Arkansas, and of many things—timber, coal, and iron—as in the State of Alabama, and all that?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Do they not go as laborers for the northern capitalists who are developing that country?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. They come there, the great majority of them, for the purpose of buying small farms and cultivating them themselves. That is preeminently the case in the Tennessee Valley, that I have the honor to represent on the floor of this House; and not only that, but these men that come there from Ohio and from North and South Dakota and from other Northern States, almost to a man of the number that were there, voted for the new constitution of Alabama which disfranchises, as you say, the negro.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. If the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON] will excuse me, in further answer to the question of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], I would state that there are whole towns of these people. They are forming colonies, like, for instance, Hammond, La., and Richland, Miss., and several others; and that the people go there to live, not merely to invest capital.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Yes; they are forming colonies in some of the counties in my district. They have a magnificent colony in Cullman, in the district just below me, and that is taking place all over that section of the South. They are purchasing farms, and our own native white population are buying and cultivating small farms.

Mr. WILEY of Alabama. If the gentleman will excuse me, I would like to make a statement.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Certainly.

Mr. WILEY of Alabama. I want to say that in my district, in Baldwin County, there is a large colony of gentlemen, composed almost exclusively of people from Ohio and Illinois. They say that the atmosphere of that county is very similar to that of California. They have small farms, and they constitute one of the best parts and a splendid part of our citizenship, and we welcome them to our borders.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the gentleman will allow me, I want to say that I ask these questions only for information. I have no opinion on the subject.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Certainly; and if I can answer any questions I will do so cheerfully.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have been answered, and I am delighted, and it is the most hopeful lifting of the curtain that I have experienced in many days. Just let that immigration go on.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. And it settles the race question—just what we say it will do. Let us alone. Do not criticise us when you are complaining and stand in dread of the same class of people invading the State of Pennsylvania and other Northern States. That is what I contend for, and nothing more than that. I say that I would hate to find a man upon the floor of the House of Representatives of the American Congress who wants the race question settled otherwise than peaceably and without sectional friction. Take the South to-day. What section of this Union is more interested in the maintenance of law and order than that section? We are just budding into a growth and prosperity that challenges the admiration and wonder of the world. Why is it, then, that people think we want disturbance and conflict? Let us alone and we will settle the question and settle it to the strength and glory of the American Union. [Applause.]

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman to yield just one more time. I dislike very much to interrupt him.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Not at all; I am glad to be interrupted by the gentleman.

Mr. BOUTELL. I want to revert just one moment to something that seemed to be intimated in the remark made by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], that there was some sinister opposition in some way to European immigration into the South. Now, we all know that immigration, if unrestrained, flows along isothermal lines. I would like to have both sides of this House join hands to-day in sending word to the people of northern Italy and southern Germany and southern France that they will find no better spot on earth, with climate similar to their own, to go to than the Southern States of this Republic.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I think that to be the truth.

Mr. BOUTELL. And if there is any factor that is preventing that sort of immigration—if there is any influence at work to discourage it—I should like to have it disclosed here on the floor of the House that an end may be put to it.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. What we need is vigorous action against anything that would operate in that way as a discouragement. I believe that the sentiments expressed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL] are the genuine sentiments of his heart; that he believes that whenever white men take the place of the negro and the negroes are scattered in minorities throughout the Union it will make a settlement of the negro problem, and make it in a proper way. We do not object to that disposition. It will help matters powerfully for the Northern States to take some of our negro population. The subject will then be understood. More opposed to a wholesale colonization of the negroes of the South.

Now I go one step further in reference to the beautiful "story" that my friend from Illinois so splendidly and in such chaste and beautiful words related on the floor of the House the day before yesterday—a story to which I listened with a great deal of interest.

Let us look and see what the South is really doing. It is a marvel to a man who will study it; it creates the profoundest surprise when he takes hold of the question and presents it to his mind in a comparative manner. I have taken occasion, in the short time that I have had to look into this matter, to hunt up some of the facts. Of course, I can only refer in a limited way to statistics. In considering this question no fair-minded man will pretend to deny that the South only got on its feet, was only in a position to do something for itself about the year 1880—I will not go back, because it would look as if I was seeking political purposes; I will not go back to compare Democratic administration in Alabama or any other Southern State with Republican administration after the war and during reconstruction. Is there a man on the floor of this House on either side who would say for a moment that the South to-day would be realizing this prosperity and hoping for a continuance and increase in the future if negro votes controlled in any of the Southern States? Not a man in the South would invest a dollar in either of those States; not a dollar from the North would be invested there. The fact that the white people, conservative, patriotic, and intelligent, are administering the laws of those States is what has brought about our improved condition and guarantees and insures an unlimited prosperity in the early future.

Twenty years ago the South manufactured in her mills but little more than 10 per cent of the cotton that she raised. What does she do now? In that short space of time in the life of our Republic, she to-day manufactures in her own mills more than 50 per cent of the cotton that she raises. What does that mean? What does it signify? Nothing hostile, nothing unkind, nothing unfriendly. The northern man, like the southern man, is seeking his best advantage and opportunity to realize upon the money that he invests. We have the climate, we have opportunities and advantages superior to the North for the manufacture of our cotton. That is all that it means. Listen to this. It tells the story better than the gentleman from Illinois can tell it and far better than I can. I take it from the Manufacturers' Record:

> In industrial interests the progress of the South has been even more striking. In 1880 that section had $257,244,561 invested in manufacturing; by 1900 this had increased to $1,153,202,368, a gain of $895,757,804, or 348 per cent. For the same period the capital invested in manufacturing in the whole country had increased from $2,790,272,606 to $9,891,486,500, equal to a gain of 252 per cent. The value of the products of southern factories advanced from $457,454,777 in 1880 to $1,463,643,177 in 1900, a gain of $1,006,188,400, or 219 per cent. During the same period the value of the products of manufacture for the whole country increased only 142 per cent. In 1880 the South had $21,976,000 invested in cotton manufacturing, with 180 mills having 667,000 spindles; this industry now counts more than 750 mills with a total of 7,500,000 spindles and a capital of about $175,000,000.
> In 1891 the consumption of cotton in northern mills was 2,027,362 bales and in southern mills 604,661 bales. In 1902 the consumption in northern mills was 2,050,774 bales, practically the same as in 1891, and in southern mills 1,937,891 bales, or three times as much as in 1891. The increase in capital invested in cotton manufacturing interests in the United States was from $208,000,000 in 1880 to $460,000,000 in 1900, a gain of 120 per cent. For the same period the increase in the South was 413 per cent. Since 1900 the increase has been so rapid in the South that this difference has been still more marked.
> In 1880 the South made 397,000 tons of pig iron. In 1902 it made over 3,000,000 tons. From a production of 6,000,000 tons of coal in 1880 the South's output advanced to over 60,000,000 tons in 1902. The lumber industry increased from 6,623 establishments in 1880, with a capital of $23,546,076, to 14,062 establishments, with a capital of $181,702,526, in 1900.

It is just such facts as these that will enable the North to better understand the South. That is what we need. These are the facts that will break down the walls of sectional feeling and misunderstanding.

Take the town where I have the pleasure to live and a few years since we had but one cotton mill. To-day there are nine. One of those, the largest of the South, established by capital from Lowell, Mass., will, when it completes its plant, bring there, as has been conservatively estimated, a population of 14,000 people. I just received the news this morning that the tenth factory was to be erected there, at Huntsville, Ala. Home capital is invested there also in large amounts. All the mills are doing well and prospering.

Just before I left home an estimate was made of the annual value of the products of the cotton mills at that place. What do you suppose it was? Four million seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars. Do you think that people who are prosperous in that way want to be disturbed in their ordinary life transactions and business by arousing the population on some inflammable project and destroying the peace and quietude that capital demands wherever it is interested?

Why, Mr. Chairman, we have more reason or inducement in the South to observe the law and do what is right—to observe the statutes of the Government and follow a wise business and prudent public policy—than any other section of this Union. Not in humiliation, not in recognition of anything that is unbecoming to us as men of honor and courage, but to advance our own interests, to advance our pecuniary welfare; and in doing that we shall find, if you let us alone, a solution of this vexatious problem about the negro. We shall find it peacefully and quietly settled.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us go a little further. What is the South doing in addition in regard to this cotton question? Why, sir, there are 110,000,000 spindles in the world, and the Southern States furnish 75 per cent of the cotton that runs those 110,000,000 spindles.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Does the gentleman desire further time?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Will five minutes be sufficient?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I should like longer time than that.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, how much time is left to our side?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts in the chair). One hundred and eleven minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Very well; I yield fifteen minutes more to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON].

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I am much obliged to the gentleman.

As I was about to say, of those 110,000,000 spindles, the South to-day has 8,500,000. Does any man think we are going to fold our arms, sit still, and use no further energy to advance the progress which has begun? Do you think that the men who have put their money in these enterprises will sit supinely down and fold their arms? No, sir.

We stand to-day on the threshold of the most remarkable prosperity of any, even the most favored, parts of the world. It will be only a few years—mark my words—when the South will manufacture in its own mills every bale of cotton that is raised there. Why, that time is coming. We feel it in our veins. The southern people are encouraged. They feel hopeful, and they know that they are going to prosper. When that takes place what is going to be the result? The South consumes in her own mills the cotton that is produced in her own fields. The world will be demanding then not less than 15,000,000 bales of cotton for the supply, because the demand for cotton goods and cotton is increasing throughout the world. What wealth it will bring to us! When that day comes these white laborers that I am talking about that will occupy or cultivate nearly the entire acreage of the South will be the men who will build up the cotton crop to 15,000,000 of bales a year. I believe that with the price fixed at 10 cents a pound—and I do not believe it is going to fall below that for years to come—Texas itself would produce probably 5,000,000 or 6,000,000 bales of cotton regardless of the boll weevil, and we hope to exterminate him.

Now, let us go a little further in these facts, because, as I said, I am here to-day in the nature of an immigration agent for the South. I believe as a practical common-sense matter that the solution of this question that has vexed us so long lies in the occupation and cultivation of lands of the South mostly by white people.

Mr. BAKER. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Certainly.

Mr. BAKER. The gentleman has announced that he is speaking as an immigration agent for the South.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Oh, yes; figuratively speaking.

Mr. BAKER. I understand.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I am not paid for it, except as a Congressman, and that is not hardly pay enough.

Mr. BAKER. Oh, well, I merely made that remark as introductory. Will the gentleman let me put this question? Supposing that instead of the present laws which obtain in the South as well as in the North on the question of taxation you had a system of taxation which placed all the burden upon the value of land—that is, land according to its value—and relieved from taxation all improvements of every kind, all forms of personal property, would that not result in such an enormous influx of population into your section of the country that not only would the immigration from Europe all go there, but you would practically denude the Northern States?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. My answer to the gentleman from New York is that I believe a single tax on land in the South would destroy the farm interests in that country. [Applause.]

Mr. BAKER. Let me ask one other question. Does the gentleman say it would destroy the farming industry—that is, it would destroy the land—or does he say it would destroy the farming industry because it would destroy the farming of farmers?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I say it because it would put such a burden upon the farmers of that country that it would take all the profit out of farming and make them pay the whole taxes practically.

Mr. BAKER. If the single tax were put in operation, I want to say to the gentleman from Alabama that where the farmers of his State are now paying $100 in taxes they would not have to pay $20. How the removal of four-fifths of the taxes they are now paying is going to ruin the farmers of the South is beyond my comprehension.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I have given what I believe to be the correct answer to the gentleman's question.

Mr. BAKER. And I have made a substantially correct statement as to the operation of the single tax, so far as it would affect the farmer.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Now, I want to go one step further, and I must do it hurriedly. In 1880 the South made 397,000 tons of pig iron. In 1902 the South made over 300,000,000 tons of pig iron. In 1880 the coal output of the South was 6,000,000 tons; in 1902 it was over 60,000,000 tons of coal, 11,000,000 tons of which came from the Birmingham district of Alabama, and the total was 20,000,000 tons more than the whole United States produced in 1880. That tells the tale of southern prosperity. God Almighty placed that coal in the ground, but it takes energy and money and industry to develop it.

Let us look at another fact. I am here to say that enterprising railroads have been of as much benefit to the development of the South as anything else. Let us take the four great States of the North and the South and compare them as to the increase of railroad mileage in the last decade. What is it? Take New York, Connecticut, New Jersey, and Massachusetts and compare them with Alabama, Georgia, North Carolina, and Arkansas. Men do not build railroads for pleasure or for fun. They build them for the purpose of making money. They build them to certain objective points where they know there is something to be found and something that will pay them for the expenditure of money in what they develop out of the ground and in the growth of cities and towns along its line.

Alabama, which has only about one-fourth of the population of New York, increased her railroad mileage one-half more than the great State of New York did in the last ten years. That is a fact that is shown by the statistics. What else? Arkansas has increased her railroad mileage two and a half times more than Connecticut. Georgia has increased her railroad mileage twice as much as Massachusetts. North Carolina has increased its railroad mileage one and a half times more than New Jersey. Is not that an indication of the growth and prosperity of the South? I do not mean to be understood as saying that we are equal in our industries to the North and Central Western States. But I say these facts and figures, which I hope to be allowed to elaborate in the RECORD, give a hint as to what the commercial strength and power in the industrial interests of this country the South will be in the near future. It tells a tale of growth and development. I will not now extend the comparison any further for fear that my motives might be misconstrued.

I believe that the great trouble that we are talking about here so much on the floor and about which so much is said in the papers, about the negroes, will find a happy and peaceful solution in this very development. I can not, Mr. Chairman, extend my remarks by reference to the development and growth of our agricultural interests, but this industry has kept pace fairly well with the other improvements of the South. We are getting along well now. I referred in the beginning of my remarks to the criticisms that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS] made on the different constitutions of the Southern States regulating suffrage. I have this to say, that when the representation of the Southern States is reduced on the floor of this House the same law will cut deep and hard into several Northern States. I have not the time, Mr. Chairman, to call attention to the limitations on the right of suffrage in several Northern States.

The South is ready for the investigation and comparison. We think in Alabama, as other Southern States think, that we have the right, when we are conditioned as we are, to regulate and limit the right of suffrage without discrimination. I think when the conservative people of the North read the constitution of Alabama on the question of suffrage they are bound to say that it is a fair and good law. Much misrepresentation has been made by designing persons to the North on this subject. I here give the provisions of the Alabama constitution on the question of suffrage:

ARTICLE VIII.

SUFFRAGE AND ELECTIONS.

177. Every male citizen of this State who is a citizen of the United States, and every male resident of foreign birth who, before the ratification of this constitution, shall have legally declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States, 21 years old or upward, not laboring under any of the disabilities named in this article, and possessing the qualifications required by it, shall be an elector, and shall be entitled to vote at any election by the people: Provided, That all foreigners who have legally declared their intention to become citizens of the United States shall, if they fail to become citizens thereof at the time they are entitled to become such, cease to have the right to vote until they become such citizens.

178. To entitle a person to vote at any election by the people, he shall have resided in the State at least two years, in the county one year, and in the precinct or ward three months immediately preceding the election at which he offers to vote, and he shall have been duly registered as an elector, and shall have paid on or before the 1st day of February next preceding the date of the election at which he offers to vote, all poll taxes due from him for the year 1901, and for each subsequent year: Provided, That any elector who within three months next preceding the date of the election at which he offers to vote has removed from one precinct or ward to another precinct or ward in the same county, incorporated town, or city shall have the right to vote in the precinct or ward from which he has so removed, if he would have been entitled to vote in such precinct or ward but for such removal.

179. All elections by the people shall be by ballot, and all elections by persons in a representative capacity shall be viva voce.

180. The following male citizens of this State who are citizens of the United States and every male resident of foreign birth who, before the ratification of this constitution, shall have legally declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States, and who shall not have had an opportunity to perfect his citizenship prior to the 20th day of December, 1902, 21 years old or upward, who, if their place of residence shall remain unchanged, will have at the date of the next general election the qualifications as to residence prescribed in section 178 of this constitution, and who are not disqualified under section 182 of this constitution, shall, upon application, be entitled to register as electors prior to the 20th day of December, 1902, namely:

First. All who have honorably served in the land or naval forces of the United States in the war of 1812, or in the war with Mexico, or in any war with the Indians, or in the war between the States, or in the war with Spain, or who honorably served in the land or naval forces of the Confederate States, or of the State of Alabama in the war between the States; or,

Second. The lawful descendants of persons who honorably served in the land or naval forces of the United States in the war of the American Revolution, or in the war of 1812, or in the war with Mexico, or in any war with the Indians, or in the war between the States, or in the land or naval forces of the Confederate States, or of the State of Alabama in the war between the States; or,

Third. All persons who are of good character and who understand the duties and obligations of citizenship under a republican form of government.

181. After the 1st day of January, 1903, the following persons, and no others, who, if their place of residence shall remain unchanged, will have, at the date of the next general election, the qualifications as to residence prescribed in section 178 of this article shall be qualified to register as electors: Provided, They shall not be disqualified under section 182 of this constitution:

First. Those who can read and write any article of the Constitution of the United States in the English language, and who are physically unable to work; and those who can read and write any article of the Constitution of the United States in the English language, and who have worked or been regularly engaged in some lawful employment, business or occupation, trade or calling for the greater part of the twelve months next preceding the time they offer to register; and those who are unable to read and write, if such inability is due solely to physical disability; or,

Second. The owner in good faith in his own right, or the husband of a woman who is the owner in good faith in her own right, of 40 acres of land situate in this State, upon which they reside; or the owner in good faith in his own right, or the husband of any woman who is the owner in good faith in her own right, of real estate situate in this State assessed for taxation at the value of $300 or more; or the owner in good faith in his own right, or the husband of a woman who is the owner in good faith in her own right, of personal property in this State assessed for taxation at $300 or more: Provided, That the taxes due upon such real or personal property for the year next preceding the year in which he offers to register shall have been paid, unless the assessment shall have been legally contested and is undetermined.

182. The following persons shall be disqualified both from registering and from voting, namely:

All idiots and insane persons; those who shall by reason of conviction of crime be disqualified from voting at the time of the ratification of this constitution; those who shall be convicted of treason, murder, arson, embezzlement, malfeasance in office, larceny, receiving stolen property, obtaining property or money under false pretenses, perjury, subornation of perjury, robbery, assault with intent to rob, burglary, forgery, bribery, assault and battery on the wife, bigamy, living in adultery, sodomy, incest, rape, miscegenation, crime against nature, or any crime punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary, or of any infamous crime or crime involving moral turpitude; also, any person who shall be convicted as a vagrant or tramp, or of selling or offering to sell his vote or the vote of another, or of making or offering to make false return in any election by the people or in any primary election to procure the nomination or election of any person to any office, or of suborning any witness or registrar to secure the registration of any person as an elector.

There is one thing else that I desire to call attention to and express my views upon. I have often said that I do not believe that Congressmen were paid enough; and I heard a distinguished gentleman from Maine, whom I do not see on the floor now, not long since make a very truthful remark. He said when he was at home he could touch a bell and one or two bell boys would answer it; but here, in his representative capacity of Congressman, they touch the bell, and he had to answer; showing the trouble and the difficulties and the burdens that we labor under as Congressmen.

The question of mileage is what I refer to. While I say that I do not believe that we are as well paid as probably we ought to be, I believed that the Federal judges were not paid enough, and under the act of the last Congress I voted to increase their pay, but I do not want to touch or take anything connected with money that has about it the taint of suspicion. Now, I am governed in my opinion, as every other lawyer will be, according to his own construction of the statute. I would not have mentioned it, because I never would have known of it if it had not been brought up on the floor of the House. I only give it as my own opinion, upon my own responsibility, to guide no other Member of the House; my responsibility is only to my constituents, who, I think, would give me full credit for honesty in any vote I would cast here. Section 17 of the Statutes at Large of the United States, Thirty-ninth Congress, volume 14, page 323, reads as follows:

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That the compensation of each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress shall be $5,000 per annum, to be computed from the first day of the present Congress, and in addition thereto mileage at the rate of 20 cents per mile, to be estimated by the nearest route usually traveled in going to and returning from each regular session.

Now, I admit, Mr. Chairman, that I lay great stress upon the word "regular." I understand that it has been done in the extra session called by President McKinley, as well as in the extra session called by President Cleveland. Those sessions adjourned before the regular session commenced. Where the Constitution says that at least one term of Congress shall meet each year, the implication is very strong, as a matter of course, that another session can meet, and when it meets and adjourns before the regular session shall commence the Members would be entitled to mileage. But when they meet, as we did on the 9th day of November, and glide quietly and softly out of that, without any line of demarcation or distinction, into the "regular" session, in my humble view, I do not believe that I am entitled to the mileage provided for in the urgent deficiency bill.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Certainly.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. There are two methods of meeting by Congress.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Both are fixed by the Constitution. The Constitution provides that Congress shall meet on the first Monday of December.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Then there is another provision of the Constitution providing that on extraordinary occasions the President may convene Congress. Now, both of these methods of meeting are by virtue of the Constitution itself. How can we construe any session of Congress called by the President in pursuance of that constitutional power, or meeting itself in pursuance of the Constitution, anything but a regular session?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I admit that there is a hazy line right along there, and the fact that controls the matter, in my opinion, is that we did not meet. It was a continuous session. We did not adjourn.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I ask the privilege of extending my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I will ask that the gentleman have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The time is under the control of the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I think two minutes more will be sufficient to complete the inquiry, and I yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I was cut off in my answer. I believe that there is a hazy line right along that, and under the ordinary construction of statutes there is a doubt existing, and I propose under this condition of circumstances to solve that doubt against myself and in favor of my constituents.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. While I fully agree with the gentleman that, under the present conditions existing in reference to this question, this Congress would be wise in not voting the mileage, I have not the slightest doubt that these sessions of Congress are regular and by law technically we have the right to make the appropriation.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Then you believe it is the law for us to get that mileage?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I believe we would be entitled to it technically under the law, but under existing conditions I think it would be unwise for us to vote it, and I would rather forego it than pass the allowance under those conditions.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I do not intend, Mr. Chairman, to take money that I would have to accept technically.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I do not either.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I want to get it absolutely legally, but I am not criticising anybody's views or opinions. I have as much respect for the gentleman's opinion of law as any man on the floor of the House, but I am giving my own construction of it.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I have not any doubt about that, but there are gentlemen who think we are entitled to this as a matter of law, of right, and of morals. I agree with those gentlemen that we have the right to take this mileage under the law, that we have the right to take it morally. But it is a delicate question to vote money to ourselves. I think, under the existing circumstances, that in the interest of economy and to avoid the suspicion of wrong, that it is best to resolve the doubts and all equities in favor of our constituents and not vote for the mileage. I am simply disagreeing with the gentleman's legal reasoning.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I frankly say to my friend from Tennessee that if I believed that I had a right to it legally I should vote for it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LAMAR of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with considerable interest and with profound attention to the discussions on this floor for the past three months, and especially did I listen with interest to the gentlemen this morning on the other side of the House. But they need not worry about the decadence of the Democratic party; neither need they worry themselves with invitations to us to come over and join their ranks. The death of the Democratic party was predicted a century ago: Federalism was to dispatch it, but Federalism died and was buried with the elder Adams.

After that the Whig party, perhaps the purist and best opponent the Democratic party ever had, was its decreed executioner; but the Whig party did not survive its great leader, Henry Clay. For a century the Democratic party in this land has been the champion of individual liberty and personal rights and has stood as a bulwark between the aggressions of concentrated wealth and power and the rights of the people, and when those principles which the gentleman espouses and that party of which he proudly boasts have been relegated to oblivion and are only remembered among the reminiscences of what once had an existence the Democratic party will still live. Democracy contains within itself the indestructible elements of perpetuity, and so long as free government and free institutions live the Democratic party will continue to exist. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I did not intend to and would not have referred to this but for the fact that the gentleman from Minnesota appeared so much troubled over our impending political dissolution, and the invitation so many times repeated by him for us to disband and join the Republicans.

You ridicule us because we exercise individual opinions; because the Democracy is made up of men who choose to think for themselves; because no one man among us can usurp to himself the power and authority in advance of a convention of the people representing all our party to name a candidate for the Presidency or to make a platform in all its details. The Democratic party is not the subservient tool of any one man or coterie of men. And I say to the gentleman now that out of this conflict of individual opinions and clash of ideas of independent manhood the combined wisdom and the intelligence of the Democratic party will construct a platform and nominate a man which will before next November lead him to change his ideas as to the decadence of the Democratic party.

I have listened attentively to the discussions and debates of the House, and have been much interested; but the reasoning and logic employed by the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber have failed to make clear to me the exact position they occupy. They strenuously insist that the sacred schedules of the present tariff law must not be interfered with; that any modification of existing rates would imperil the prospects, and perhaps the existence, of many of our industrial concerns; would close the furnaces, shut down our factories, stop the wheels of our mills, and bring in its train of concomitant misfortunes all the evils their imaginations can conceive or their rhetoric describe; and especially they tell us would result in throwing out of employment or reduce the wages of the poor laborer, for whom they manifest such apparent concern. When any reduction or modification of duties on the necessaries of life is mentioned, they prate much of "competition with the pauper labor of Europe," and tell us such a condition would ruin us, and that our manufactories are unable to meet such competition. I quote here from an article from the American Economist of December 25, 1903, the organ of the American Protective Tariff League, in reply to an editorial in the Springfield Republican. The editorial is as follows:

Protectionism of a reasonably moderate sort, applied to a country situated as ours has been during a century past, may be said to have demonstrated its right to respectful consideration in any opposing school of thought.

The reply to that from the Economist is this:

Really we should like to know what "protectionism of a reasonably moderate sort" is. Such statements as the above appear frequently in our free-trade journals that profess to know what they are talking about, and yet how empty are such assertions. There can be no such thing as "moderate" protection any more than there is such a thing as partly locking the door. If the door is not sufficiently bolted to keep out the intruder, it is not locked at all. If an industry in the United States needs a 50 per cent duty to overcome the inequality of wages between those given the American workingmen and the foreign competitor, then a duty of 49 per cent is not protection at all, nor would a duty of 51 per cent or more be any higher protection.

And this is the burden of the argument of the other side on this floor, that without protection, solely for protection's sake, without reference to any consideration of the revenues of the Government, our industrial system could not stand; that it can not, unaided by legislation, unsheltered by prohibitive tariff, withstand the flood of cheap goods from foreign factories with which our markets would be overwhelmed, and we are told they are "too wise to revise the tariff on the eve of a Presidential election," and that they are "standing pat," and that they "hold the ace," whatever those terms may mean.

Some time since, during the debate on the Cuban bill, I was surprised at some of the admissions made by the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], the leader of the majority on this floor. Ever since I can remember Republicans have been trying to teach the people in my State, first, that "the tariff is not a tax at all," and, secondly, that "if it is a tax, the foreigner pays it," and to intimate that it is a tax, which the consumer must and does pay, would there be considered by all good Republicans the rankest kind of heresy, and for a Republican to admit it, treason even of a worse sort than the "Iowa idea."

Yet the distinguished gentleman from New York said in the course of the debate, to which I have referred—alluding to the tariff on sugar, "and so it is we put the rate of duty higher on sugar than was absolutely necessary, because we could get this splendid revenue from the sugar duty; a revenue that came from the people of the United States, who used it in their households." Verily, it is then true, as we have so long contended, that the consumers of this country pay, in the increased cost to them, the duty on the almost innumerable articles of daily necessity and consumption, and which in most instances does not go to the Government to enhance its revenue, but into the coffers of some trust to enable it to declare a larger dividend on its watered stock, while at the same time reducing the wages of its employees. You admit that the increased cost, by reason of the tariff, on reapers and mowers, and plows, and hoes, and rakes, and harness, and wagons; on wire and nails, and sewing machines, and cutlery; on shoes and clothing, and china and stone ware, and on the thousands of articles of necessity which enter into the millions of homes throughout this land, is paid by the consumers, and that this species of toll—for it is a toll—is collected from all, for all use and consume some of these articles; is taken from the earnings of one class, by virtue of this species of legislation, and given to another class.

Our Republican friends are remarkable for the modesty of their claims. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is full of figures and statistical tables and comparisons of the present condition of the country as contrasted with that of ten, twenty, and thirty years ago. If they find more people here now, it is due to the Dingley law. If they find more mines and farms and factories and railroads than we had two or three decades back, it is, according to their logic, due to protection. If a beneficent Providence has sent the sunshine and showers and seasons to bless the industry of our farmers with good crops, they sing praises to the Dingley bill and not to the Almighty. If our population has increased and multiplied, they, by some system of reasoning satisfactory, I suppose, to themselves, give credit to the Republican party and not to that blessed class of American women who prefer rearing children to leading a poodle dog by a string. [Applause.] Neither supply and demand, nor failure of crops, nor foreign wars, nor famine, as they reason, have any effect on prices. If mules raise in price on account of foreign wars, blessed is the Dingley law. To them it is the source from which all blessings flow.

In a circulation statement issued by the Treasury Department January 1, 1904, the average circulation per capita for the United States on that date is given at $30.38. And because the average per capita circulation is greater than at some period in the past, because there is more wealth in the nation to-day than there was a decade ago, we are to lose sight of its distribution, lose sight of the question of whether the people who produce that wealth receive their just share of it, but are told we must "stand pat" and "keep on letting well enough alone" on the simple proposition "that because the country as a whole is increasing in wealth we must assume that the laws are just and equitable and need no alteration or modification." No one denies that the country is increasing in population, in wealth, and in power, but the vice in this line of reasoning lies in averaging the wealth.

By the same system of reasoning it can be demonstrated that a pauper and a multimillionaire, on an "average," are both millionaires, but the one is several times a millionaire, while the other has nothing. The trouble is it is only an imaginary average, and it requires quite a stretch of the imaginative faculties, even of a Republican, to imagine the equitable distribution among the people who produce it and from whose pockets it has been extorted of the millions and billions of dollars owned and controlled by these tariff-fostered and tariff-sheltered trusts and which go into the average of the wealth of the country. These "average" circulation statistics and "average" property statistics are perhaps all right as "averages" on paper; but the truth is the wealth has been diverted by class legislation from those who produced it to the favored class, many of whom "toil not, neither do they spin, yet Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these."

Their modesty is remarkable. If the price of an article is increased—under their logic—it is the Dingley law; if wages are higher there is no possible explanation or reason to be given for it than the protective system. A year ago, when stocks and securities were high, all this prosperity was the outgrowth of Republican policies; but when the bubble bursts—when stocks go down, when wages are cut, and men are thrown out of employment—then we are gravely told that the Dingley law has nothing to do with it.

I desire here to read an editorial from the Springfield Republican, and a reply from that same paper to which I referred a moment ago; the American Economist. The Springfield Republican says this:

Mr. HANNA stood up before the Republican national committee yesterday and repeated his familiar injunction to "stand pat." All that is necessary to bring about the continued success of the Republican party, he declared, "is to stand pat upon the principles and policies of that party."

When Mr. HANNA repeats his well-worn injunction, he is fairly exposed to some answering questions coming up from the people. Are the 100,000 and more cotton workers whose wages have been cut asked to stand pat on the reduction? Is the steel industry to stand pat on the collapse, which is admitted to be one of the worst ever experienced? Are the commercial interests to stand pat on such reaction from prosperity as is reflected in the heavy record of business failures shown for two or three months past? Is the country to stand pat on the shrinkage in the market value of securities, which, according to the Secretary of the Treasury, equals the cost of four years of destructive war?

Replying to that editorial, the Economist has this to say:

What, we should like to know, has the Dingley law got to do with the price of cotton, which is the sole cause of the reduction of wages of the thousands of cotton workers in New England? What, we should like to know, has the Dingley law to do with the labor troubles aggravated by such men as Sam Parks, which has resulted in idleness of a hundred thousand men and the cessation of building and construction, having so great an effect upon the consumption of iron and steel products? What, we should like to know, has the Dingley law to do with the leveling of quotations of industrial and railroad securities caused by abnormal inflation of values and the great watering of stocks?

Here the great champion of protection, the most ultra "stand-patter," the organ of the tariff league, the paper that strenuously opposed the Cuban reciprocity bill as a breach in the protective fortifications, the ne plus ultra of protection, informs us that the Dingley law has nothing to do with the price of cotton, nothing to do with the reduction in wages of the thousands of cotton workers in the mills of New England, nothing to do with the conditions which have resulted in idleness of a hundred thousand men, nothing to do with the consumption of iron and steel products, nothing to do with the decline of industrial and railroad securities. Had the opposite occurred our friends would have loudly proclaimed that their policies and laws caused it all.

We have been trying for years to combat this theory—that "the tariff is not a tax," and "the foreigner pays it," and that it costs the consumer nothing, and have toiled hard and long and patiently to convince people otherwise on many occasions; and now it is rather gratifying to hear the distinguished gentleman admit it. That statement, that the tariff is a tax, which the consumer pays, coming from the distinguished leader of the other side admits a fact which Republicans have denied and Democrats asserted for so long "that the memory of man runneth not to the contrary." This interesting admission condenses the whole protective theory into the simple doctrine of taxation of all the consumers for the benefit of a few protected interests. But without conceding the soundness of this doctrine, even if protection were necessary for the profitable employment of our mills and factories, let us examine the admitted facts, and ascertain if, without the tariff, or at least with a material modification of many of its schedules, they could not still operate at a profit, and if the shelter it affords by preventing competition does not enable them to practice extortion upon the great body of American consumers.

I quote here from pages 15, 16, 17, and 18 of the last Republican campaign text-book:

AMERICAN INVASION OF EUROPE—THE UNITED STATES COMPETING WITH EUROPEAN MANUFACTURERS IN THEIR HOME MARKETS.

In the last two years there has been much agitation in Austria and other continental countries of Europe against "the American peril" and "the American danger." This agitation was due to the American invasion of European markets with American manufactures as well as American produce.

Heretofore our sales have been made up almost wholly of food stuffs and raw material. Europe was the workshop. But that has changed, and we find, year after year, an astonishing increase in our exports of manufactured articles, an increase that in the last two or three years reached totals which give ample basis for the popular talk of invasion of the European industrial fields. Our exports of manufactured articles in the decade prior to 1897 averaged $165,000,000 annually. In 1898 our sales of manufactured articles to foreign customers jumped to $290,000,000, the next year to $339,000,000, the next to $434,000,000.

Imports decline.—These figures, showing a steady invasion by our manufacturers of foreign industrial fields, have a natural corollary. As exports of manufactures increased our imports of the handiwork of foreign shops showed an even more rapid decline. Our manufactures were not only invading the foreigner's own markets, meeting him at his threshold with a new competition, but they were taking away from him his greatest market—the United States. We have in the last dozen years been manufacturing for ourselves a vast amount of goods such as we have been accustomed to buy abroad.

One can turn from the contemplation of these great totals to an examination of the records made in recent years by individual industries and find, in detail, facts upon which to base a belief that the United States has acquired or is acquiring supremacy in the world's markets. So many industries have been sending rapidly increasing contributions to swell the rising tide of our foreign commerce that it is difficult to tell any detailed story of American commercial expansion without making it read like a trade catalogue.

The increase in our exports of manufactured articles can, in the main, be traced to advances made in the manufacture of iron and steel and to the display of inventive talent in the making of machinery. The development of our grasp on the world's markets for articles manufactured from iron and steel has been no surprise to those who early recognized the position of America in respect to the raw materials from which those articles are produced. America unquestionably possesses advantages in respect to her iron ore and coal mines far superior to those of any other country and, based solely upon that superiority, has already become the greatest producer of iron and steel in the world.

American locomotives in Europe.—American locomotives running on American rails now whistle past the Pyramids and across the long Siberian steppes. They carry the Hindoo pilgrims from all parts of their Empire to the sacred waters of the Ganges. Three years ago there was but one American locomotive in the United Kingdom; to-day there is not a railroad of importance there on which trains are not being pulled by American engines. The American locomotive has successfully invaded France. The Manchurian Railway, which is the beginning of oriental railway building, bought all its rails and rolling stock in the United States. American bridges span rivers on every continent. American cranes are swinging over many foreign moles. Wherever there are extensive harvests there may be found American machinery to gather the grain. In every market of the world tools can have no better recommendation than the mark, "Made in America."

American windmills are working east of the Jordan and in the land of Bashan. Phonographs are making a conquest of all tongues. The chrysanthemum banner of Japan floats from the palace of the Mikado on a flagstaff cut from a Washington forest, as does the banner of St. George from Winsdor Castle. The American typesetting machines are used by foreign newspapers, and our cash registers keep accounts for scores of nations. America makes sewing machines for the world. Our bicycles are standards of excellence everywhere.

Our typewriters.—Our typewriters are winning their way wherever a written language is used. In all kinds of electrical appliances we have become the foremost producers. In many European cities American dynamos light streets and operate railways. Much of the machinery that is to electrify London tram lines is now being built in Pittsburg. The American shoe has captured the favor of all Europe, and the foreign makers are hastening to import our machinery that they may compete with our makers. In the Far East, in the capital of Korea, the hermit nation, there was recently inaugurated, with music and flying banners, an electric railway, built of American materials by a San Francisco engineer, and now is operated by American motormen.

One might go on without end, telling in detail the story of American industrial growth and commercial expansion. In the list of our triumphs we would find that American exports have not been confined to specialties nor limited as to markets. We have been successfully meeting competition everywhere. America has sent coal to Newcastle, cotton to Manchester, cutlery to Sheffield, potatoes to Ireland, champagnes to France, watches to Switzerland, and "Rhine wine" to Germany.

This statement also was used almost verbatim by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DICK] in a speech found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of December 16, 1903. On December 20, 1903, an article appeared in the St. Louis Republic, written by the correspondent of that paper from Sydney, Australia—I think Mr. Frank G. Carpenter—and I desire to copy that article in my remarks at this point.

[Special correspondence of the Sunday Republic.]

WASHINGTON, December 18, 1903.

The prospect is that the United States will push their foreign trade during the coming year as never before.

The home market is almost glutted, and if our factories are to keep busy they must make goods for the world outside.

I have described the markets of Europe, where our trade amounts to about a billion dollars a year, and I have also written of our invasion of South America.

In this letter I will point out our possibilities on the other side of the globe.

In the first place, take Australasia.

* * * * * * *

Sydney has already 500,000 people, and it grows like the bean stalk up which little Jack climbed to fight the giants.

Sydney stands about third among the great British cities in trade.

It is only exceeded by London and Liverpool, and it does more business than Havre, the chief port of France.

Several American firms have houses in Sydney and transship our goods from there to all parts of Australia.

But what do we sell away down there below the equator?

A recent shipment of one of the big San Francisco steamers included 400 tons of sewing machines, 1,000 tons of fencing wire, 400 tons of roll paper, and 80,000 cases and 1,500 barrels of kerosene.

There were also rifles, guns, and revolvers, tons of Philadelphia lawn mowers, Chicago reapers, wagons knocked down, coffee mills, and all sorts of patent medicines.

Another cargo arrived about the same time, bringing 24 locomotives from Wilmington, Del.; 700 tons of paper, and 4,000 tons of other manufactured goods.

This last shipment weighed 10,000 tons and was valued at $1,000,000.

About two years ago I traveled over the greater part of eastern Australia.

I found our reapers and mowers for sale in every town and was told that the Australians liked our farm tools.

So far only the heavy agricultural machinery is being properly pushed.

The McCormicks, the Deerings, and others of our implement firms work Australia as carefully as they do their home territory, and they have to fight for every inch of the ground with the Canadian and European exporters. Nevertheless, they have the bulk of the business and make a good profit.

The same should be the case with the lighter farm tools.

All sorts of farm implements, plows, hoes, forks, and rakes might be sold in large quantities, as well as every class of American goods made of iron and steel.

Our carpenter tools are popular. Seven-tenths of all the saws used in that part of the world come from the United States, and the American ax is considered the best in the market.

Among the biggest purchasers of Australasia are the colonial and municipal governments.

They control the railroads and buy in quantity for both the electric and the steam roads, so that our steel trust drummers can make big sales if they know how to work the officials. As it is now, American engines are used on many of the lines, and some tracks are laid with American rails.

There are a few Pullman cars and other kinds of American rolling stock. Australasia has now about 13,000 miles of tracks and the governments are pushing the roads in different directions to develop the country.

Only the other day the gentleman on the other side from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], in a burst of eloquence on this floor, told us that—

Two years ago I stood on the deck of a Japanese liner in the harbor of Vladivostok, Siberia. In the hold of that ship were 700 tons of American agricultural implements that had come across the Pacific Ocean from America for the use of the peasants of Siberia. They came under the Dingley tariff law.

Right across the other side of the harbor was an English tramp ship loaded with American steel rails from Pennsylvania, that had been shipped there to be used by the Siberian Railroad, and shipped there under the Dingley tariff bill.

That day I went ashore, and at night, at the hotel in Vladivostok, I was introduced to a gentleman who told me that he represented the Baldwin Locomotive Works, of Philadelphia, and had just finished a contract by which he had put into operation on the Siberian Railroad 150 Baldwin locomotives, shipped there under the Dingley tariff bill.

The next day I rode 500 miles up to the Amur River over American steel rails shipped there under the Dingley tariff bill. The day following I got aboard the steamer to go up the Amur River 1,500 miles. It was a steel steamer and had in tow two steel barges, both made in Pittsburg, Pa., sent there—12,000 miles, to the other side of the world—and shipped there under the Dingley tariff bill.

The first night out we wrecked one of these barges and the freight had to be unloaded. There were all sorts of American products in that cargo of freight. Ten thousand miles from here, gentlemen, in the little Siberian village of Gorbitza, consisting of a dozen log houses, in a little store not over 8 by 10, we bought packages of candy wrapped up in paper on which was printed the picture of William McKinley to popularize that candy among the peasants of Siberia, all shipped there under the Dingley tariff bill. All the way across Asia my journey on the cars was made safe and pleasant by the Westinghouse air brake, made in Pittsburg, Pa., and shipped over there under the Dingley tariff bill. The finest stores in Europe—in Vienna, in Berlin, in Paris, and in London—are those which are selling American shoes shipped there under the Dingley tariff bill.

In a colloquy on this floor, I think between the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BENNY] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], a newspaper item from the New York American was read. It is as follows:

BERLIN, November 15, 1903.

The Frankfurten Zeitung's Constantinople correspondent says the Pennsylvania Steel Company has been awarded the contract for 20,000 tons of steel rails for the Mecca Railway, in competition with the Krupps and several other German and Belgian establishments. The price is $22.88 per ton in Beirut. The price of steel rails in the United States is $28 per ton, which is the highest average price in ten years.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], replying to a statement of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BENNY] in this connection, said that it was the first time he had ever heard a Democrat solicitous about railroads in the purchase of steel rails, which reply was applauded on the Republican side.

Ah, gentleman, that statement may serve as a temporary evasion of the question. It may be all right as repartee, but it will not satisfy the voters of this country. They know that they pay for this increased cost in increased freight and passenger rates. Railroads are not benevolent or charitable institutions, and when it costs more to construct, repair, and operate railroads, they must of necessity, and do, charge the people more who use them. You tell us one moment that the industries of the country can not exist without protection, and boast in the next that "They are meeting competition everywhere." You say in one sentence that imported free-trade goods would close our mills and throw our laborers out of employment, and in the next tell us these same manufacturers are shipping their goods everywhere, paying freights, and selling them in open competition with the products of the world.

The soil of South Africa, Australia, and Japan is turned by American plows, shipped there under the Dingley law, and sold, after paying the freight, in competition with the trade of the world. Yet the American, over whose field perhaps floats the smoke from the very factory making those plows, must pay 20 per cent, or one-fifth, more, not to the Government, but to the implement trust, for the plow he follows. The clatter of American harvesters shipped there, you tell us, under the Dingley law, and sold, after paying freights, in competition with the world, may be heard in Europe and in Asia and wherever there are harvests to gather. Yet the Missouri or Illinois or Iowa farmer who buys a mower or reaper or binder must pay 20 per cent, or one-fifth, more into the till of the "international harvester" trust.

The hum of the American sewing machine may be heard along the banks of the Bosporus, the Danube, and the Rhine, and is found in the palace of the oriental, shipped there and sold in open competition with the trade of the world. Yet the poor American seamstress who lives under the very shadow of the factory where they are made must, when she buys a machine, if she is so fortunate as to be able to own one, pay a higher price than is paid by the German peasant on the banks of the Rhine.

You boast that locomotives made in Philadelphia draw the crowned heads of royalty over European hills, and that the echoes from the silent solitudes of the Siberian desert are awakened by the shrill whistle of the American engine, running over American steel rails, shipped there from Pittsburg and sold for $5 less per ton than they are sold in America to build roads to carry the grain and live stock of America's farmers to market on; that these American manufacturers are building railways and bridges for the oriental potentates cheaper and better and quicker than anybody else on earth can do it; and yet you say these same manufacturers can not exist in competition with European manufacturers and that the American who consumes their products must be taxed for their benefit.

You tell us "American shoes have captured the favor of Europe, and the foreign makers are hastening to import our machinery that they may compete with our makers;" that "the finest stores in Vienna, in Paris, in Berlin, and in London are those which are selling American shoes, shipped there under the Dingley law," and yet the American shoe manufacturers must, by legislation, be permitted to extort from the earnings of the American purchaser of shoes from 25 per cent to 45 per cent increase in cost to protect these same manufacturers from competition with the European shoe manufacturers, and the very man who drives a peg or stitches a seam in the shoe in the factory where they are made must contribute his share of this bonus, or tribute, to the shoe trust, under this unholy schedule. Such are the blessings of protection.

"We are shipping cutlery to Sheffield," yet the American housewife must pay from 40 to 60 per cent more for her table cutlery—her knives and forks—her dishes, her china and glass and earthen ware, that the tariff barons may enjoy the beneficient results of protection. You say, in your campaign book, and I assume it was prepared after deliberation and with consideration, and you ratify and confirm it on the floor of this House, "In the list of our triumphs we would find that American exports have not been confined to specialties nor limited as to markets. We have been successfully meeting competition everywhere." If you can pay the freight 10,000 miles and meet competition there, why can't you do it here, with such incidental protection as a strictly revenue tariff would afford, when the burden of the item of freight rates would be lifted from you and added to the selling price of that competitor who can't meet your prices on his own ground. If he can't meet your prices when you pay the freight, how under heaven can he undersell you when he pays the freight?

I want to insert at this point a table showing domestic and foreign prices on a number of articles:

Export and home prices.

Article and description.	Quantity quoted.	Export price.	Home price.	Per cent of difference.
Acetylene-gas generator, Colt, 10-light.	Each	$40.00	$55.00	37

In explanation of a few items in the above table it may be said that some of the American prices are taken from the Iron Age of May 22, 1902. Not all of the prices quoted are for May, but all or nearly all are for the year 1902, and there is every reason for supposing that similar prices and differences existed in May.

The export prices on heavy steel goods, like rails, billets, structural materials, etc., are not contained in the table, partly for the reason that exact prices are not known and partly for the reason that the present home demand in these lines is such that our manufacturers are not just now bidding for export business. They are, however, filling orders at prices from 20 per cent to 40 per cent below home prices and are undoubtedly securing some new orders, especially in bridge material. It should be remembered that the pools and price agreements on rails, billets, sheets, plates, structural work, etc., are not in force on export goods, and our manufacturers usually compete freely in foreign countries. The blessings of competition are still enjoyed by foreigners even when dealing with protected manufacturers.

Facts in regard to the export prices of lead were given in the Oil, Paint, and Drug Reporter of December 30, 1901, and in the testimony of Mr. John M. Peters before the Ways and Means Committee on April 2, 1902.

Figures and schedules are to most people very dry reading. My deliberate judgment is that it is only because of the insidious and deceptive methods by which this system of legalized extortion is carried on that it has been tolerated this long. No man knows or can tell at the end of the year the precise amount he has been forced to pay by reason of it in increased cost to him of the articles he purchased during the year, and it would require a vast amount of study and labor to find this out. On some things there is a specific duty, on some an ad valorem, on others both, and on others a graduated rate, varying on different classes of the same article.

The Spanish war revenue tax suggested a thought to me. If under the revenue laws articles were priced at what the cost would be without the tariff, and then the purchaser had to buy a revenue stamp representing the increased cost by reason of the duty; if the farmer could buy his plow, his mower, his reaper, his fencing wire, his nails, his harness, his shoes, his clothing, and his furniture at what they would cost him if there were no duty, and then were forced each time he made a purchase to expend from one-third to one-half more for a revenue stamp to paste on the article; if the good housewife could buy her cutlery, her china, and household necessities for what they would cost less the duty, and then had to expend one-third more for a revenue stamp representing the tariff duty, each knowing when they did it that this added cost for the stamp did not reach the Government Treasury, but went into the maw of some tariff-nurtured trust; if this or any other system existed by which the people would fully know just when, how often, and how much was being extorted from them that the manufacturing parasites might fatten at their expense, there would not be but one election thereafter until the whole pernicious system of legalized robbery would be revised and reconstructed along the lines of a strictly revenue basis.

You talk about the laborer and the workingman, and even while you are talking thousands are being thrown out of employment, and the cost of living, as shown by Dun's Review for January 9 of this year, has increased since January 1, 1897, more than 30 per cent. Here is that statement in detail:

PRICES PROPORTIONED TO CONSUMPTION.

[Dun's Index Number from Dun's Review.]

In the following table the course of prices of commodities is shown with due allowance for the relative importance of each. Quotations of all the necessaries of life are taken, including whisky and tobacco, and in each case the price is multiplied by the annual per capita consumption, which precludes any one commodity having more than its proper weight in the aggregate. For example, the price of a bushel of wheat is multiplied by 5.55, representing the annual per capita consumption of 4½ bushels for food, and the remainder as allowance for seed. The price per pound of coffee is taken 9 times, of cheese 2.3, of chemicals only fractions of an ounce in some cases. Thus, wide fluctuations in the price of an article little used do not materially affect the index, but changes in the great staples have a large influence in advancing or depressing the total.

For convenience of comparison and economy of space the prices are grouped in seven classes: Breadstuffs include many quotations of wheat, corn, oats, rye, barley, beans, and pease; meats include live hogs, beef, sheep, and many provisions, lard, tallow, etc.; dairy and garden products embrace eggs, vegetables, fruits, milk, butter, cheese, etc.; other food includes fish, liquors, condiments, sugar, rice, tobacco, etc.; clothing covers the raw material of each industry, and many quotations of woolen, cotton, silk, and rubber goods, as well as hides, leather, boots, and shoes; metals include various quotations of pig iron and partially manufactured and finished products, as well as the minor metals, tin, lead, copper, etc., and coal and petroleum; miscellaneous include many grades of hard and soft lumber, lath, brick, lime, glass, turpentine, hemp, linseed oil, paints, fertilizers, and drugs. The third decimal is given for accuracy of comparison; thus, $101.587 representing $101.58 and seven-tenths of a cent. This figure does not purport to show the exact average annual cost of living on January 1, 1902, because wholesale prices are taken and all luxuries omitted. Its economic value is in showing the percentage of advance or decline from month to month.

In the following table the latest index-number figures are compared with earlier records:

NOTE.—Breadstuffs include many quotations of wheat, corn, oats, rye, and barley, besides beans and peas; meats include live hogs, beef, sheep, and many provisions, lard, tallow, etc.; dairy and garden products include eggs, vegetables, and fruits; other foods include fish, liquors, condiments, sugar, rice, tobacco, etc.; clothing includes the raw material of each industry, and many quotations of woolen, cotton, and other textile goods, as well as hides, leather, boots and shoes; metals include various quotations of pig iron, and partially manufactured and finished products, as well as minor metals, coal, and and petroleum. The miscellaneous class embraces many grades of hard and soft lumber, lath, brick, lime, glass, turpentine, hemp, linseed oil, paints, fertilizers, and drugs.

In the way of decreasing the amount of living and increasing the amount of work, protection has proven a success; but most men desire as much living for as little work as possible, and not the greatest possible amount of work and the least possible amount of living. We do not live that we may work, but work that we may live. You grow almost pathetic about conditions in 1893, and almost shed tears as you talk of Coxey's army, and describe "the fire dying out in the furnaces," and "wheels ceasing to turn," and "the empty dinner pail," and the general stagnation which prevailed; but you fail to remember that every law on the statute books when that panic came, and when it went, was a Republican law. We had the McKinley tariff law and the Sherman financial law.

You are "standing pat." You say, representing the Government: "I do not need and do not want this additional revenue, but I will lay the tax so that you, the selected and favored ones, may collect it. I do not need to tax the consumer for myself, but I will hold while you tax him."

Every tax, in mathematical language, is a quantity affected by a minus sign. Yet you are standing pat on the theory that we can tax ourselves into prosperity; that it is the duty of an obedient and subservient peasantry and artisan class to pay the taxes and support the other part of the political and industrial and economic structure; that the lower class should pay upward and the upper ranks bless downward.

We were right in 1896, and we were right in 1900. We were asking for more money with which to do the business of the country, and the subsequent additions to our stock of metallic money from an unforeseen and unexpected source has only vindicated the principles for which we then contended and to which we still adhere.

The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] boasts that in the district which he represents there are more manufacturing industries than are in all the districts of all the Democratic Members who sit at the table of the Ways and Means Committee of this House. We, at least some of us, proudly say to him that we represent more than any other one class that class of American citizens upon whom all other classes are dependent; that great class who constitute about one-half the population of this country; that class the fruits of whose industry have given to us those magnificent balances of trade of which you boast and brought to the country from abroad the greater part of that wealth the enjoyment of much of which is denied them by your unjust exactions that your favored class may fatten; that class who more than all others sustain the country in peace and are its bravest defenders in time of danger; that great class of brawny, vigorous American farmers in whose humble homes and around whose firesides honor and patriotism and all the virtues which make up the best type of American citizenship find their abode. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I wish the gentleman on the other side would consume some time.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I understood a few moments ago that there was spare time on this side of the House, and I thought that I would take advantage of it. I desire to discuss very briefly the financial proposition embraced in the article prepared by the honorable gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] and published in Everybody's Magazine. I wish I were better prepared to discuss it and had known that I was going to speak. The article is headed, "What Democracy now stands for."

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. In that connection——

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Of course I assume that the gentleman is not responsible for that heading.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I am not responsible for the heading.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Nor for the introductory paragraph, which states that it is an authoritative statement.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. No.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I did not assume that, because I know the gentleman too well to suppose for a moment that he would put a heading of that kind above an article of which he was the author; but for the statements in the article the gentleman is responsible. I desire to read so much of that article as relates to the probable future views of the Democratic party in the opinion of the leader of the minority.

The article reads as follows:

> The same old principle of Democratic equality, or approximate equality of benefit and of burden, ought to show that the Democratic party could not very well stand in finance for the Aldrich bill or the Fowler bill—certainly not for any proposition looking toward the giving out for circulation of Government-guaranteed currency upon the deposit of the bonds of private corporations, thus making the Government a partner in the affairs and in the maintenance of the credit of a few selected, and therefore favored, bond-issuing corporations.

If that means anything, gentlemen, it means that the Democratic party in the future is to be absolutely opposed to the national-banking system. I am not overstating that, am I?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I should think you are overstating it a great deal, if you are confining yourself to the construction of those words in my article.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut (reading):

> The same principle, when applied to the present system of Government deposits with national banks would teach, or ought to teach, that the Government ought not virtually to lend its money free—would teach, or ought to teach, that if Government money is to be deposited in banks at all (and with a revenue far beyond the needs of an economical or even of the present extravagant Government, that seems a present necessity in order not to starve commerce and industry by lack of cash), then the deposits ought to be made upon some system whereby there could be secured, first, undoubted, gilt-edged, and infallible security for the return of the principle deposited, and, secondly, in such banks as, having given that security, should, by competitive bid, offer for the deposit the highest rate of interest.
> Nor is there any Democratic reason why Government deposits, amply secured in some such way as I have indicated, should be confined to national banks alone, it being apparent that the security which ought to be deposited in the Government vaults in return for the money deposited in the bank vaults would be, as above indicated, a self-sufficing security, totally independent of the bank's future solvency or insolvency.
> Talking about depositaries and their security, except the miraculous construction by the President and his Administration of the treaty with Colombia, whereby the pledge of the United States to "guarantee the sovereignty of Colombia" over the transisthmian strip was construed to mean a promise to upset that sovereignty by preventing Colombia from enforcing it, there is nothing quite so marvelous as the construction which the Secretary of the Treasury gave to section 5153 of the Revised Statutes. The language of that section is this—

And this is what I would wish to call to the attention of both sides of the House, the language of this statute as I read it, and the construction which the gentleman from Mississippi himself has put upon it and upon the action of the Secretary of the Treasury—

> "The Secretary of the Treasury shall require the associations thus designated" (meaning the depositaries) "to give satisfactory security by the deposit of United States bonds and otherwise * * *." The Secretary of the Treasury simply and calmly scratched out the word "and" and inserted the word "or" in lieu thereof.

The language of that statute is this:

> The Secretary of the Treasury shall require the associations thus designated—
> Meaning the depositaries—
> to give satisfactory security by the deposit of United States bonds and otherwise.

The gentleman says the Secretary of the Treasury simply, calmly scratched out the word "and" and inserted the word "or" in lieu thereof.

I take the ground, gentlemen, there is absolutely no difference in the meaning of the statute as it is and its meaning as revised by the gentleman from Mississippi in criticising the action of the Secretary of the Treasury in the change of the word "and" and "or," if it had been so changed, as it was not, and as this article would seem to imply. But if it had been, it would have made no difference whatever in the power conferred upon the Secretary of the Treasury.

Now I go further. I hold in my hand the report of the Treasurer of the United States for the present year, just issued, and I call the attention of the gentleman from Mississippi to the fact that the policy and action of the Secretary of the Treasury to-day are in accord with Democratic policy from 1784 down to now; that there has not been a minute, except from 1846 to 1860, when this policy has not been pursued in precisely the same way that it now is; that again and again in the early history of the Government and under Democratic administration investigations were made, reports were made by select committees of Congress and by the Secretary of the Treasury himself, and invariably that action was sustained and continued for fifty years under Democratic administration.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Does the gentleman contend that it was under that statute?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. That statute did not exist. It was done before this law was enacted. Let me call the attention of the gentleman to the Treasurer's report, on page 20, where it commences with the history of the transactions of the Treasury. It shows that down to 1836 all of the money of the Government was deposited in banks and no interest paid upon it, and all under Democratic Administrations, and all without interest; and that is the true policy under which the Treasury of the United States should be conducted. I find that the transfer of deposits by President Jackson was only from one bank to other banks, and that his "pet banks" troubled him exactly the same under a Democratic Administration as they are liable to give trouble under Republican Administrations.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I would like to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that President Harrison condemned this practice in one of his annual messages to Congress?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. And every business man will condemn a practice by which the money of the people of the United States is taken from them, if taken unnecessarily and placed out at interest and put up at auction, as proposed by the leader of the Democratic minority upon the floor of this House.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. But does the gentleman deny that President Harrison condemned the policy of placing the money of the United States in the banks without compensation?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Very likely he might have done so. I do not know whether he did or not.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. But he did do so.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. It has been the practice since the beginning of the Government down to now; and if the gentleman will turn to the report of the Treasurer of the United States, at page 140, he will find a statement showing for every year from the beginning of the Government the amount of money that has been held in the Treasury and the amount of money which was found in the public depositories; he will find that clear down to 1836 there was none held in the Treasury of the United States, but that it was all in banks, as States, cities, and corporations hold it to-day, and as we ought to do now, keeping the money in circulation rather than withdrawing it. He will find that from 1836 to 1846 it was divided, partly between the banks and partly in the Treasury, and during this decade an occasional interest charge. From 1846 to 1860 he will find it all in the Treasury of the United States, and from 1860 he will find it partly in the banks and partly in the Treasury.

Now, then, personally I believe it ought to be all put in the banks, and not withdrawn from circulation, so that it might be used and not locked up.

I believe it would be wise to change the law and permit that to be done. But I challenge any man to find any real distinction between the statute as it is to-day with the word "and" in it and the statute as it would be with the word "or" in it, which seems to be the crime which the gentleman from Mississippi has laid at the door of the Secretary of the Treasury. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am glad for one that the country has a leader on the Democratic side who is not only willing to criticise but is glad to suggest. I think it is a distinct step upward in the policy of the Democratic party when as a minority party they are willing to become a constructive party, or at least make suggestions as to legislation, and we are not at a loss to-day to know just exactly what the Democratic party would do, if it had the power, with regard to the finances of the country. The gentleman states his unwillingness to comply with the terms of the Aldrich bill and has introduced into the House of Representatives and had referred to the Ways and Means Committee a bill of his own as an alternative proposition.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Not as an alternative proposition to the Aldrich bill.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Well, as a substitute proposition for the present condition of things, and I ask the gentleman what is the purpose——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. It is simply to strike down one of the evils—and not one of the least—that is now existing, that is all. It does not pretend to be a comprehensive banking and currency measure at all.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. It was certainly introduced for some purpose. Now, what is the purpose and object of this bill? That once in three months the surplus funds of the United States should be put up at auction to the highest bidder, either to be placed on call or to be placed on time. I deprecate, either on the Republican or Democratic side, any policy looking to such a dangerous use of the Government funds. I deprecated the introduction of the Aldrich bill into Congress for that reason. I was opposed to it. Our funds are now secured by United States bonds. A proposition was introduced at the last session of Congress to have them secured by miscellaneous securities.

Now, I want to show you the retrograde steps we have taken since that came in. Under that bill Government deposits could be secured by State bonds which had not defaulted on their interest, the bonds of certain dividend-paying railroads, and the bonds of certain cities of a hundred thousand population. What happened? Certain gentlemen rose up and stated that the bonds of their cities were just as good as if they had a hundred thousand population, and down went the limit of population to 50,000. Another gentleman rose and said: "I live in a city where the population is only 15,000, but our bonds are absolutely good, as good as those of the city of New York," and down went the limit again. Down went the limit on railroad bonds.

Then it came to county bonds, and nobody knows where it will end if the door is once opened. And that is not all. I see a very distinguished gentleman sitting here right before me whose acquaintance I enjoy and appreciate, yet in this session of Congress he has introduced a bill by which he proposes to permit the United States to make an absolute investment of its surplus money in miscellaneous bonds, county bonds, State bonds, etc., to be bought and sold in the markets. The United States Treasury on Wall street; think of it. That is not all. In another end of the Capitol we have got a bill for the use of these same miscellaneous bonds to secure national-bank circulation, and that is the way we have gone since that original proposition of the Aldrich bill was introduced. There is where we have gone and there is the tendency; and, gentlemen, I must confess that this proposition is still more dangerous than anything I have seen.

Now, could it be accomplished? No. It is absolutely impossible, with safety to the country. And if anything was accomplished it would be wholly in the opposite direction from that which the distinguished gentleman expected. Now, why? The Aldrich bill possessed the same imperfections that this bill does. That had been carefully examined and objected to here, but one day a telegram came from Chicago—a "round robin," signed by the officers of every bank in the city—protesting against its passage. Why? Because the effect of it, gentlemen, would have been exactly the same as this would produce, namely, to strip every Government deposit from every country bank throughout the United States and concentrate them in Wall street; and I do not believe that is what the gentleman from Mississippi intends. Now, let me demonstrate it. In making a proposition of this kind he overlooks one thing—that it becomes necessary to invest in bonds for security. I will show you what the effect would be under the terms of this bill if the plan of the gentleman from Mississippi was carried out. Under the present law it would be necessary to buy $100,000 of 2 per cent bonds in order to put up the security, at 105½, the price at which they stand to-day, and this, in a community where the market rate for money was 6 per cent, would take $105,500, with an annual loss of interest of $5,330, when that purchase was made.

Now, you would get back from that $2,000 interest on your bonds, so that as far as you have now gone you would be out of pocket $4,330. To buy your 2 per cent bonds in a 6 per cent section of the country you have got to take 6 per cent money and invest it at a 2 per cent rate, so you have lost 4 per cent on your principal and an equal rate on the premium. The next step is to pledge your bonds with the Government and get a deposit of $100,000. If no reserve was required you would have $100,000 to loan and you would receive from that as interest $6,000, and deducting what was lost annually in the bond investment you would be making by the transaction $1,670 profit on your deposit. Now, about a 2 per cent community.

You must bear in mind that there is but one 2 per cent market in the United States, and that is Wall Street, with money on call. There is only one. How would the Wall street banker figure this proposition? He would buy a 2 per cent bond with 2 per cent money and would lose only $110 because of his bond investment, and would receive $2,000 interest on his loan, and consequently he would be $1,890 ahead. So that the highest bid that a country bank could make with a 2 per cent bond, without reserve, would be 1.67 per cent, and the Wall street banker with a 2 per cent market could bid 1.89 per cent.

Now, figure that out in the same way with the reserve required and you will find that a 6 per cent banker in the country could only bid at the auction which you would hold once every three months seventy-seven one hundredths of 1 per cent, while the Wall street banker, with a required reserve of 25 per cent instead of 15 per cent, with a 2 per cent money market could bid 1.39, and he could strip the whole country of these deposits and put them all in Wall street.

Now, how does this bill differ from the Aldrich bill? In this respect, that the Aldrich bill made a minimum limit at which the Secretary without receiving bids could put out the money at 1½ per cent, and you make no minimum at all. The Aldrich bill provided for any amount the Treasurer could loan and for any rate of interest above 1½ per cent, and you put it up at auction in amounts not exceeding the capital of a bank. There is the difference between your bill and the Aldrich bill. They would work absolutely in the same way and to the same end by stripping the country banks of the United States and centering that money in Wall street. Therefore it was not strange that every bond speculator and broker in the United States looked forward with delight and gleeful anticipations to the passage of that bill.

Now, take a miscellaneous bond. I know gentlemen here are apt to think that this could not be so with a 4 or 5 or 6 per cent bond. There is a profit in it unquestionably, but the profit is the greatest in the lowest rate of interest market. There is an apparent fallacy there; but yet, when you come to figure it up, you find it is absoluetly so, because you start on the proposition of the higher your rate of interest the more you have got to lose in the bond purchased for security, and that loss must be deducted from the interest received from loaning the Government deposit.

The higher the rate of premium, the more still you will lose. Let me show you how that works out on a miscellaneous bond. Take, for instance, Columbus, Ohio, and compare the 6 per cent and 2 per cent rates:

Investment in a Columbus, Ohio, bond at 110¼ and paying 4 per cent interest, $110,750; at 6 per cent annual interest, $6,645, loss; deduct coupons, $4,000, gain; net loss, $2,645. Deposit, less 25 per cent margin required by the Secretary on miscellaneous bonds, $75,000; less 15 per cent reserve, $11,250; net loanable fund, $63,750; at 6 per cent interest, $3,825; net gain on transaction, $1,180.

The same deposit on the same bond, with a reserve of 25 per cent required instead of 15 per cent, would show, at a 2 per cent interest rate, a net profit of $2,910.

Now, who could afford to make the highest bid? The country banker or the Wall street one?

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. PRINCE. I think in the gentleman's remarks he referred to a bill that I had introduced, wanting to invest one hundred millions of the one hundred and sixty-eight millions now in national depositories, for which the Government is getting no interest.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Yes.

Mr. PRINCE. The Secretary of the Treasury placed that money in the hands of the national depositories, did he not?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Yes.

Mr. PRINCE. Now, let me read, if you please, for a moment, what the Secretary of War has done with reference to money that has come into his hands as a result of the sale of the Philippine certificates.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I understand, and I will state now that the case is not a parallel one at all. That is money which the Philippine Islands have got to keep as a gold reserve to maintain the parity of their silver currency. They must keep it. It is a permanent fund, subject only to drafts in case there is a demand for gold. The parallel does not exist at all between that case and our condition. We ought not to have a surplus in the banks of the United States. I am free to say that I admit it. But if we are to have it, and so long as it continues, it ought to be there on business principles, ready to be drawn on at sight, not loaned out, for governments borrow, but do not lend.

Mr. PRINCE. Just let the gentleman answer this, after I have read it. It is on page 15 of the report of the Chief of the Bureau of Insular Affairs. It is as follows:

The 3,000 $1,000 certificates were sent to New York by two representatives of this Bureau to save the large cost of expressage, and on May 1, as promised, they were turned over by the Guaranty Trust Company of New York, insular depository for Philippine funds in New York, to the successful bidders, who deposited therefor with said insular depository $3,075,390. If this amount could have remained at the agreed rate of interest, 3½ per cent on daily balances, there would have been a profit of $63,028.65 on this issue at the end of the year.

Proposals to bidders under date of July 9, 1903, and similar to the first proposals, gave the information that the certificates would be dated September 1, 1903, and that bids would be opened in this Bureau in the presence of bidders on August 25, 1903, at which time it was found that the bid of Harvey Fisk & Sons, of New York, $102.24 per $100 for the entire issue, was the most advantageous, and the award was made accordingly. The Guaranty Trust Company, of New York, had previously agreed to give the same rate of interest on daily balances—3½ per cent—on the proceeds of this second sale.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I will ask the gentleman this question, whether he believes it is the function of government to take money from the people by taxation and then to loan it out to them at interest?

Mr. PRINCE. I do not.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Well, that is the fundamental principle of the whole thing.

Mr. PRINCE. But let me suggest to the gentleman that we have to-day one hundred and sixty-odd millions of dollars with which we can not pay the bonded indebtedness for some twenty-three or twenty-five years to come. We tried within the last year to purchase the face value of some sixteen millions of bonds and we had to pay for them something like twenty-two millions. In other words, we paid a premium of 37½ per cent.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I admit all that the gentleman says. I simply repeat again that it is not the function of the Government to take money from the people by taxation and loan it out at interest.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Is it the function of the Government to take the money away from the people and then give it to them, or, rather, lend it to capitalists without interest?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. It is the function of government to collect money by taxation, for its expenses. The effect of your proposition, and of all of these kindred propositions, whether they are Republican or Democratic in source, will be to lower the standard until finally we will get back to where we were in the tale recited so efficiently some time ago by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL], when the United States Government took its money and divided it up among the States pro rata.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now, I want to ask the gentleman this question: The gentleman says it is not a part of the function of government to lend its money at interest on call.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Not to.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. But he admits it is quite excusable to give its money away on call. Now, then, as I understand it——

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Of course I do not admit anything of the kind.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman admits that the present system is quite excusable.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I admit that the present system is on a business basis, just exactly as the gentleman himself would take his surplus money and deposit it in a bank subject to his own check, and would not loan it out at interest.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Let me go ahead a moment further. I want to ask the gentleman if money deposited at interest on call is not just as much subject to the gentleman's check, or, in this particular case, to the Government's check, as money given away on call or deposited without interest on call?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Perhaps so.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Are the deposits on call not subject to exactly the same power to check whenever you please, whether at interest or not?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Unquestionably, in theory.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now, one further question. The Government has now, I believe, about $150,000,000, in round numbers, deposited in the national banks.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. One hundred and sixty-five million dollars, I believe.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Well, then, we are about to build a Panama canal; we can pay for it by checking upon those banks. Suppose the United States Government should to-morrow want to check out that $165,000,000 all at once for some purpose. I ask the gentleman whether it would not produce a panic in this country?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I think it would; and that would be precisely the result which would be accomplished under the terms of the bill if you shifted those deposits once in three months to the highest bidder.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. It being true, then, that if we should check for the whole of those deposits, now bearing no interest, it would produce a panic in this country, it must be true also that the Government can not practically check for that amount to-morrow if it is wise as a Government; it must be true also that it will not do so; and then it must be true also that this is a sort of permanent loan; and if it is, why should not the Government receive whatever rate of interest the money is worth to the parties who have the use of it and are using it?

And if that be true, why is it not Republican and Democratic doctrine that this way of doing business should not be confined to the national banks, or to banks of any sort for that matter, provided the man who borrows those deposits has absolutely self-sufficing and independent securities, putting it beyond the peradventure of doubt that he will pay the principal?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I thank the gentleman for that suggestion, for it only shows the downward course we would be pursuing if this policy should be followed by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Treasury should become a one-man bank to loan out the funds of the Government, he alone under the statutes being the judge of the collateral.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now, will the gentlemen tell me a single evil about this system—and there are evils about it, I admit, evils necessary to extravagant government which overtaxes the people, because there ought not in a good government be any surplus at all, except a working margin, and that surplus ought to be in the subtreasuries of the Government—I am meeting a condition, not trying to establish a new order of things—will the gentleman point out a single evil that could come about from depositing this money on call in banks on interest that does not exist where you deposit that money on call in the banks without interest?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I have been trying to explain to the gentleman that under the present law, with Government security—and I am willing to take no other; I am willing to accept no other than Government bonds as security for Government money—it is impossible to do it, unless you concentrate all your deposits in a 2 per cent money market, and there is but one such in the United States—Wall street.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I do not wish to take too much of the gentleman's time. But the question I have asked and the question I should like the gentleman to answer is this: Under a system of keeping Government money outside the vaults of the Government, in banks, on interest, where could there be a single evil that would not also exist under a system of keeping the Government money outside the vaults of the Government, in banks, without interest?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I think the difference is in the method. As I said before, there is not a bank in the United States, even one with only $25,000 capital, that is not required by the statutes to have a board of at least five directors to consult and advise with its president. Any man familiar with banking business knows that the most vicious thing in the whole banking system is what is called a "one-man bank"—where the president does the whole business, makes the loans and certifies them, without the advice of the board. The almost inevitable end of such practice is ruin.

Now, by this process of loaning out Government funds on promiscuous securities, you are making the Treasury of the United States a one-man bank, with the largest fund of any bank in the world, to be loaned out on promiscuous security at the discretion of one man. I say it is absolutely vicious. Rather than adopt such a system I would abandon any interest for a century; and no man can deny the correctness of this principle.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. One other question. How is the present system of leaving it to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury to select the banks to serve as Government depositories, without interest, to be any less a "one-man" banking scheme than a system which would leave him to select—not in his discretion, but according to their bids—the persons or institutions who should receive these deposits on interest?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Why, simply for this reason that Congress has prescribed the security and that it shall be Government bonds.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. But this bill does not change the security now provided by law. On the contrary, it leaves the security just as it is to-day.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I admit it; but I have tried to tell the gentleman a half a dozen times that it is financially impossible to bring about the result that he expects, for the result of his bill with the present system of security maintained——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. That is another question.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut (continuing). Would be to strip the whole country of the deposits and would not result as he expects it would, because——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman disagrees with me there, but that is another question. That is not what I am on now. The thing I am on now is, will you tell the House now, if the Secretary of the Treasury had to dispose of the deposits in banks under a law requiring him to give the deposits to the banks which with equal security—being the security now required by law—should bid the highest interest, why that would be any more open to the charge of being a one-man-bank scheme than the present system, whereby the Secretary of the Treasury, without any guiding law, within his own discretion, selects banks wherever he chooses and leaves the money without interest?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I understood I had forty-five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. There are only five minutes remaining to that side of the House, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] said he wanted five minutes.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. How much time has this side of the House?

The CHAIRMAN. That side of the House has fifty-nine minutes.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Do I understand that I have the courtesy of the gentleman to proceed? Do I have any more time?

The CHAIRMAN. Not on the Republican side.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The House by unanimous consent has fixed the time at which this debate is to close.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I will pursue this line at some other time. There are some few things in regard to it that I would like to bring to the attention of the House, but I will take advantage of some other occasion.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I have but five minutes remaining, and I yield that to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. HASKINS].

Mr. HITT. Will the gentleman move that the committee rise for a moment?

On motion of Mr. HEMENWAY, the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TAWNEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 10954, the urgent deficiency bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HITT, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. 11287) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905; which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I desire to reserve all points of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER. All points of order are reserved.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. HEMENWAY, the House again resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the urgent deficiency appropriation bill, with Mr. TAWNEY in the chair.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. HASKINS].

Mr. HASKINS. Mr. Chairman, owing to the fact that yesterday I was engaged in committee I was not present during the remarks of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK]. This morning, however, my attention was called to what he stated with reference to the constitution and laws of Vermont touching the question of suffrage. I read from his remarks:

> I respectfully invite the attention of the distinguished gentleman and of the Union League Club to the constitution and laws of the State of Vermont, by which citizens who are of quiet and peaceable behavior, and who have the approbation of the board of civil authorities, shall alone be permitted to vote; the most far-reaching provision that was ever adopted in any State, North or South.

Mr. Chairman, the original constitution of the State of Vermont was adopted in 1777. Its framework was the constitution of Pennsylvania of 1776. However, in this particular they did not agree. Pennsylvania placed her suffrage provisions upon taxpaying; Vermont based her suffrage upon manhood only, supplemented by an oath, which we designate as the "freeman's oath," which is taken by the "first voter." Now, that there may be no misunderstanding or misapprehension hereafter as to the constitution and laws of Vermont, I desire to have them incorporated in the RECORD. They are very brief. I read first from the "Declaration of rights of the inhabitants of the State of Vermont," chapter 1:

> ART. 8. That all elections ought to be free and without corruption, and that all freemen, having a sufficient, evident common interest with, and attachment to, the community have a right to elect officers, and be elected into office, agreeably to the regulations made in this constitution.

I now read the plan or frame of government, chapter 2, section 21; and this was the provision of 1777:

> SEC. 21. Every man of the full age of 21 years, having resided in this State for the space of one whole year next before the election of Representative, and is of a quiet and peaceable behavior and will take the following oath or affirmation, shall be entitled to all the privileges of a freeman of this State.

Then follows the freeman's oath:

> You solemnly swear (or affirm) that whenever you give your vote or suffrage touching any matter that concerns the State of Vermont you will do it so as in your conscience you shall judge will most conduce to the best good of the same, as established by the constitution, without fear or favor of any man.

Then comes section 42:

> SEC. 42. The declaration of the political rights and privileges of the inhabitants of this State is hereby declared to be a part of the constitution of this Commonwealth and ought not to be violated on any pretense whatsoever.

These are the provisions only in the constitution. I now read from the law, the statute of Vermont, fixing the rights and the qualifications of voters:

> SEC. 60. Citizens of the United States and persons who have become citizens of this State by virtue of the constitution or laws are, while residing in the State, citizens thereof.
> SEC. 61. Every male citizen, 21 years of age or more, having resided in the State one year next preceding a general election, shall have a right to vote at such election for the officers to be elected therein in the town where he resides on the day of the election. But he shall not vote for town representative or justices of the peace at such election unless he resided during the three months next preceding the election in the town in which is his residence on the day of the election.

Now, the election officers under our law are the justices of the peace and the selectmen and the town clerks of the several towns, and in the cities they are the mayor and aldermen and justices of the peace. Our town officers are elected annually; our justices of the peace are elected biennially. The question as to a man's politics, to be elected a justice of the peace or a selectman, never enters into the election at all.

Now, so far as the approbation of the board of civil authority to a claimed voter taking the freeman's oath is concerned, the inquiry is simply confined to the question of citizenship, residence, and age. The provision of the statute in this respect is to guard against fraudulent registration and voting by persons who have never taken the freeman's oath, and who are known as "first voters."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Georgia to read the Vermont law.

Mr. HARDWICK. Section 66 of the Vermont law, code of 1894, reads:

> No person shall be admitted to take the freeman's oath or to vote at an election until he has obtained the approbation of the board of civil authority of the town in which he resides.

Exactly what I stated yesterday. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HASKINS. If the gentleman will allow me——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. He has only a minute, and that has expired.

Mr. HASKINS. He has only occupied half a minute.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am willing.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. His minute has expired, and if it has not, we must go on.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I think in view of the fact——

The CHAIRMAN. The minute has not expired. [Laughter.]

Mr. HASKINS. For forty years I have been one of the election officers in my town, and I never heard the question as to a man's politics or as to his good behavior raised whenever he had offered to register or to present his vote.

Mr. HARDWICK. I have made a statement about the law and not about the practice.

Mr. HASKINS. That is the practice.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I will not have time nor do I desire to reply to the gentleman from Connecticut in extenso. After I shall have used five minutes, please "call me down." Now, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Connecticut does not understand the difference between the word "and" and the word "or" in the construction of a statute is totally beyond my comprehension.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. That may be.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now, what would the difference be as to these words when put in this statute: "The Secretary of the Treasury shall require the associations thus designated to give satisfactory security by the deposit of United States bonds 'and' otherwise?" It means, with the word "and" there, that in part the security has got to be in United States bonds, and with that out, and if the statute should read, with the "security by the deposit of United States bonds 'or' otherwise," that would mean that no part of it would be required to be in bonds of the United States.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Could it be all United States bonds; under your construction of the language could it be United States bonds?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. It could be all or part, either one; it could not possibly be all of anything else and no United States bonds. Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has attempted laboriously to prove, through some arrangement of figures which I could not follow in my head, that in a country where money lends for 8 per cent the people could not afford to bid as much for United States deposits as in a country where money loans for 3 per cent——

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. My five minutes will not allow me to yield. And the only thing I caught when you were explaining it was this, that you said that a man would have to sacrifice 8 per cent money in the purchase of United States bonds, but you forgot that after the man had sacrificed 8 per cent money in the purchase of United States bonds upon which he would draw 2 or 3 per cent, then he would begin to use the money, and use it in an 8 per cent money market.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Certainly, I agree with you.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi (continuing). And that is absolutely what the gentleman did not mention, or at least failed to mention——

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Will the gentleman yield——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. No, I can not. Now, the gentleman says that I would have a "public auction" take place "once in three months" for people to bid for United States deposits. Well, under the present system, you have a public auction "once in three months" for people to bid to the Secretary of the Treasury to be given United States deposits, because I have quoted in the bill the language of the present statute when I say that "it is hereby made the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury on the 1st day of July, on the 1st day of October, on the 1st day of January, and on the 1st day of April of each year" to do certain things, namely, to deposit the money on interest in a certain manner.

The present law is that it shall be deposited at those times in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury with a perfect right to select his personal or political friends, if he chooses to do it, all over this broad country, and to give that immense amount of money which they could use in either a 4 per cent or a 6 per cent or an 8 per cent market without their paying a cent. The word "auction" means nothing; the law now simply gives an "auction" once in three months under the present system without anybody having to pay anything except compliments, flattery, good graces, and perhaps promises to the powers that be, whereas under my system they would have to pay some cash.

The gentleman forgets when he makes that comparison, too, that under the ruling of the Secretary of the Treasury, where he calmly wiped out the word "and" and puts in the word "or," that the security would not have to be confined to United States bonds any more than now. The bill provides that the security given shall be the same security as is now required by law, and of course it is subject to the same regulations and construction under the present Administration.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Will the gentleman pardon just a word? That rule that provided there should be a margin of 25 per cent puts the financial transaction on the same basis as Government 2 per cent bonds, and consequently makes my mathematical calculations exactly correct.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, the mathematics which can convince me that a man who can use money at 8 per cent can not pay as much to get money as the man who can not use it at over 3 per cent will never be discovered. The mathematics can not be found that can convince me of that proposition. Now, Mr. Chairman, United States banks throughout this country deposit their reserve up in New York banks and the New York banks pay 2 per cent for it. Why can not the United States Government be paid 2 per cent?

Now, I am a good-natured fellow, and instead of making that a public bid and giving it to the highest bidder, I think it would be an improvement over the present plan if you would require them to pay, say, 2 per cent, and make it fixed. But let the Government cease gratuitously to favor certain banks over others. To put out to highest bidder among banks, State and national, first furnishing absolutely self-sufficing security for repayment, would be better. Why? Because that would carry the money to those parts of the country which need it most for productive enterprises and home development, and not to the great centers where small interest prevails and where it is used chiefly for speculative purposes on 'change.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WILEY].

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. HEPBURN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills and joint resolution of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 421. An act for the relief of W. J. Kountz;

S. 372. An act authorizing the recorder of the General Land Office to issue certified copies of patents, records, books, and papers;

S. 250. An act granting to the State of Idaho 50,000 acres of land to aid in the continuation, enlargement, and maintenance of the Idaho State Soldiers and Sailors' Home;

S. 921. An act granting to the State of Wyoming 50,000 acres of land to aid in the continuation, enlargement, and maintenance of the Wyoming State Soldiers and Sailors' Home;

S. 903. An act providing for the purchase of metal and the coinage of minor coins, and the distribution and redemption of said coins; and

S. 792. An act to aid in the erection of a monument or memorial at Point Pleasant, W. Va., to commemorate the battle of the Revolution fought at that point between the colonial troops and Indians, October 10, 1774.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. WILEY of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, at an early day of the present session I had the honor to introduce into this House a bill (H. R. 10429) for the erection of a monument, in the city of Washington, to the memory of Jeremiah O'Brien, upon which shall be inscribed the words:

Erected to the memory of The heroic Irish-American,
Jeremiah O'Brien,
Who captured and sank
In the first sea fight of
The Revolutionary War
The British schooner Margaretta.

Commodore John Barry has justly been characterized as the father of the American Navy. I am pleased to be advised that a similar bill has already been introduced in this House, authorizing the erection of a monument, at our beautiful national capital, to keep fresh in our remembrances the illustrious services he rendered his country, both in peace and in war, and to make luminous and glorious the growth and development of the American Navy, in the rapid march of the most marvelous century that ever chronicled the brilliant achievements of the human race. All honor to his memory!

But while we are rendering a just tribute to the man whose genius and brains created our Navy, let us not forget to do honor to another patriot, Jeremiah O'Brien, who fought the first naval battle in our contest for freedom and struggle for independence from the British Crown, nor fail to perpetuate the virtues and the valor of the thirty-five brave, free, and independent men who, under his leadership, did a deed so grand and enduring as to excite the wonder and challenge the admiration of the civilized world. History does not record the name of a hero who has excelled in dauntless courage and in unconquerable patriotism the immortal Irish-American sailor of whom I speak.

These intrepid men from sawmill and shipyard have glorified our nation's flag and ornamented the brightest page of the annals in which are inscribed the brilliant events that have transpired during the past one hundred years in this "Union of our fathers and sires." The white angel of peace has descended upon the village of Machias, in the State of Maine, and now abides within her gates. But not so in the memorable month of May, 1775. Then the tocsin of war was heard on her streets and excitement ran high in every household. A wondrous change has come over the spirits of her inhabitants and hangs above the face of the mighty waters. The sweet flowers of hope and faith are climbing and blooming over the ruined and deserted cannon, which once belched forth the fires of carnage and death in the first sea fight of the Revolutionary war.

The story runs like this:

The news of the battle of Lexington reached Machias early one Sunday morning. It was the 10th of May, 1775, and just then there was an armed Government schooner in front of the town waiting to convoy a couple of lumber-loaded sloops to Halifax.

The young men of the little village, fired by the story of the deeds of their kinsmen, gathered and plotted to lend their mite to the cause; but what could be done? The guns of the schooner covered the town; there were other guns in the little old blockhouse, and there were a few muskets; but the village authorities were Tories, and all the gunpowder was locked fast in the magazine beyond their reach. There was powder in Jonesboro, 10 miles away; but no man dared go to get it for fear of being missed.

And so it happened that Mary Chandler, a young girl of 17, slipped quietly from the little meetinghouse during the sermon, walked over the rough trail to Jonesboro, and that night carried on her shoulders 25 pounds of powder back through the woods to Machias.

This blockading craft was His Majesty's schooner Margaretta, manned with a crew recruited from the hardy seafarers of Nova Scotia, and full of the brawn and muscle and grit which had contributed so essentially to make true the boast, "Britannia rules the waves."

When the shadows of evening came down upon both land and sea the commander of the Margaretta, as a precautionary measure and in order to guard against a possible covert attack at night, moved the schooner down the river to the bay a few miles away, where he thought he would be in a safe position to hold the rebellious village in his relentless grip; but no sooner was he out of sight than Jeremiah O'Brien, himself a lumberman, a gentleman of judgment and discretion, of cool nerve and indomitable will, "born to command," organized at once for offensive warfare.

His force consisted of thirty-five picked men, selected from among the shipbuilders and sailors of Machias. Full of mettle and ardor, young in years, keen of eye, strong of limb, and compact of body; brave and generous, every soul of them, with the health of salt air in their cheeks and the love of country in their hearts; "disdaining fortune," buoyant in hope, and proud in their own self-esteem; each a veritable Hotspur, putting on the "dauntless spirit of resolution," impatient of wrong and weary of oppression; daring to do all that mortal man could do to redress their grievances, this Spartan band, under the skillful generalship of the gallant O'Brien, rushed, as it were, from the very summit of the mount of defiance and quickly seized and unloaded one of the lumber-laden sloops and equipped her for battle, arming her with the old guns dragged from the blockhouse, and stowing away in her hull the powder which Mary Chandler had brought to them through the mazes of a thick forest.

Sailing into the bay as the rays of the early morning light gilded the eastern sky, "dire was the clang" as the two crafts ranged alongside one another and exchanged dreadful broadside shots. Soon the schooner's foresail rattled to the deck and all was over with her, for closing in upon her and holding her fast, Jeremiah O'Brien, at the head of his thirty-five "Down Easters," boarded, captured, and sank her. Thus we perceive that this insignificant little sloop was the babe which has grown into the full proportions of the white fleet of our superb Navy. The splendid courage which O'Brien and his men, true and tried, exhibited on this memorable occasion gave our Navy, strange to relate, its first start. It is now the magnificent arm of the greatest Government the world ever saw—a navy power, invincible upon all the navigable waters of the globe, engaged everywhere and at all times in the laudable endeavor to protect our citizens at home and abroad, to conserve the public peace, to defend popular rights and preserve constitutional liberty.

There is something that irresistibly touches our noblest sensibilities in the heroism of duty fearlessly performed—a heroism which is willing to sacrifice self in a righteous cause, even though the atonement can not make it victorious. In this instance, success crowned the efforts of our hero, Jeremiah O'Brien. He counted it a crime "no tear could ere efface, to purchase safety with compliance base." He was

In his honor impregnable,
In his simplicity sublime.

In him was truth and nobleness—man's fidelity with woman's tenderness. He was tried in the furnace and proved true. He was "weighed in the balance" and not found wanting. He has been "declared sterling by the general consent of mankind."

If there be one country upon the map of nations which challenges our sympathy more than all the rest that country is Ireland. This lovely island, rising from the bosom of her own beautiful waters, staggering under a governmental policy which brought poverty and gloom to the people, was for many long and dreary years neither cheered by the songs of her native bards nor stirred by the eloquence of her impassioned orators. The blighting hand of English tyranny had laid her low, stripped her of her verdure, and she stood forth like a lone waste in a flowery land, but, thank God, the daybreak of the sun of freedom from oppression, of liberty of thought, of speech, and of religious and political action for the downtrodden children of Erin is beginning to appear in the east and to flood with light of gold the earth and skies and seas.

Prosperity is at last coming to their homes. "A hewer of wood and a drawer of water" on his own soil, the Irishman, under every sun and in every clime, outside of his own country, whenever and wherever the door of hope and opportunity has not been closed against him, has demonstrated a genius for work and a patience in the conquest of details, a loyalty to principle, a devotion to truth and love of country which have forged him to the very forefront in every profession, vocation, occupation, and calling in life.

Jeremiah O'Brien was an Irishman by birth, but an American by adoption.

The Irish-American citizen, what shall I say of him? Loyal to the "old flag" and faithful to the country of his adoption, true to his friends, generous in nature, magnanimous in disposition, liberal in his views, and public spirited always, he is not only preeminently qualified for self-governing citizenship, but frequently sets us an example of industry, economy, and morality, the influence of which is felt as a potential factor in the intelligence, thrift, and law-abiding qualities which characterize the communities in which he lives.

With loving impulse we gladly spend large sums of money from year to year out of a national fund raised by common taxation to protect and beautify the graves of those who died in defense of the Union. We make liberal appropriations in order to mark by some enduring structure the particular spots where Federal soldiers and sailors fought and fell for their country's sake.

We are wont to erect monuments to those whose careers have illustrated courage, fortitude, patriotism, self-sacrifice, and fidelity to principle; to those who have become renowned in the public service; to those who have been benefactors to the human race; to those whose endeavors in the arts and sciences, letters and learning have exalted them among the nations of the earth. We have built magnificent cemeteries at Vicksburg, Chattanooga, Gettysburg, Nashville, Murfreesboro, Culpeper Court House, Manassas, Arlington, Winchester, and on a score of other fields. These silent cities of the dead are surrounded by costly stone fences, adorned with trees and parks, and everywhere ornamented with headstones of marble or monuments of granite to point out the last resting places or to mark the green graves of those who "died on the perilous edge of battle."

Washington is a city of monuments; and it is meet that these memorials should arrest our gaze in every park and common, on every street, along every highway, and in every public ground of the nation's capital. Father Ryan expressed words as sweet as celestial fruits or the breath of flowers from Paradise when he penned these radiant lines:

> Yes, give me the land of the wreck and the tomb;
> There's grandeur in graves, there's glory in gloom;
> For out of the gloom future brightness is born,
> As after the night looms the sunrise of morn.

But it may be asked, Why should I from the far South feel such an interest in a New England patriot as to be prompted to introduce a measure in this Chamber looking to the erection of a monument to his memory? The answer is easy. The only real liberator is Truth, and she makes none free save those who strive to break their own fetters.

Heroism derives its courage from the motive which prompts men to display courage and fortitude. "Know ye the truth; for the truth will make ye free." The fratricidal war between the two sections of our common country is over. Our swords have been broken into plowshares and our spears into pruning hooks. The North and the South alike will hold their dead in tender memory forever. The South is proud of the men who wore the gray, charging up the frowning heights of Gettysburg, on Lookout Mountain, on the banks of the Potomac, in the gloom of the Wilderness, on the fiery trail from Dalton to Atlanta, on the rolling Rappahannock, on the red hills of Georgia, and in the valleys of Virginia and Tennessee. The North very justly feels a like pride in the fortitude and valor of the men who wore the blue. On every battle plain, from the mountains to the sea, monuments more enduring than brass have been erected to preserve the fame and to tell posterity the glorious deeds of her patriotic dead. Lee and Grant, Jackson and Thomas, Stuart and Hancock, on both sides generals of unblemished character, belong to no section, but to the whole country. They "are immortal names that were not born to die," and their fame is the common heritage of us all.

The surviving veterans of the South returned to their homes to begin anew the battle of life. They understood the situation, and accepted it in good faith; and majestic as they were in war, they were grander and more glorious still in the busy pursuits of peace. We are loyal citizens of the nation. From the past we have derived wisdom and drawn inspiration. By the Constitution, as it now is, we intend to stand. Let that book of the organic law be read by the people never too often, as the book of the laws of Moses was brought forth and explained to the children of Israel in Jerusalem near the shrines of their ancient altars.

The adversities of the South have stirred her manhood, stimulated her energies, and prepared her to work out for herself and posterity a far greater and more fruitful progress than she ever attained when the tide of her fortune ran at its flood. Her stricken fields have ripened once more and her gardens are sending out the fragrance of their flowers. "The violets still bloom in the depths of her valleys," while the stars sit, each upon his "ruby throne," and watch with sleepless eye a golden land of beauty and sunshine, from which even in the disruption of southern institutions the old romance has never departed.

We are banded together, as never before, in the common bonds of union, loyalty, fraternal love, and civil liberty. Sectional lines have been obliterated. After a third of a century of peace and prosperity we are all kneeling side by side at the altar of a reunited faith. We have but one flag in the skies. The melodious tunes of Dixie and Yankee Doodle have blended together into one national air.

The dagger of Spain was unsheathed. Innocence, helpless age, and infirmity were falling beneath its perfidious blows. In the midst of the fires of the Maine the heavens cried aloud for vengeance. The men and the sons of the men who had faced each other under two flags in battle's stern array now felt the elbow touch, fighting as brothers under "the Stars and Stripes" to free a new world from the barbarity of a merciless despotism. Wearing the same uniform, whether on land or sea, Lawton and Wheeler, Dewey and Schley, Bagley and Capron, now living and dead, under the folds of "Old Glory" fought for God and humanity. They have emblazoned their names upon the loftiest entablatures in the temple of fame. They will live forever in song and story, and add luster to the glory of the nation which gave them birth.

Let us build the monument which the bill under consideration provides for. It will commemorate the glory achieved by American valor and do honor to one "whose remembrance will, to ears and tongues, be theme and hearing ever." [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I now yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. RIDER].

Mr. RIDER. Mr. Chairman, since the beginning of this session of Congress, to the delight and entertainment of its Members, we have heard discussions concerning Canadian reciprocity, good roads, currency, the tariff, the race question, and, indeed, a résumé of the civil war by one of the distinguished Members on the other side has been offered for our consideration and edification. The Republican Members have put forth the claim that the present prosperity of these United States is due solely and entirely to the Dingley tariff, and the more deeply religious Members on the Democratic side have had the temerity to say that Almighty God had something to do with the present prosperous condition of this great land of ours. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a few words in relation to the construction of the canals of this country.

While there has been much discussion concerning the violation of the treaty rights, the amity of nations, the policy of the Government, and international law concerning the recognition of the new Republic of Panama, it is nevertheless true that the recognition of this Republic has brought us to a point where we can realize the hope and ambition of the United States for many years and unite the East and the West as they have never been united before. The canal is now an assured fact, and will be constructed along the route already selected by Congress. It is too late to discuss the practicability or feasibility of any other route. The present Administration may be subjected to severe criticism in recognizing the new Republic of Panama. But to him who rises above all partisan ties and looks to the welfare and benefit of this great nation it is, "My country—may she ever be right; but right or wrong, my country!"

For four hundred years men have dreamed of piercing this wall, thus saving one-third the distance in circumnavigating the globe. It was in 1551 that the Spanish historian, Gomara, urged on Philip II the importance of piercing this Isthmus, and two hundred years ago one of the most celebrated freebooters said: "The spoils of Granada I count for naught beside the knowledge of the great Lake Nicaragua and the route between the north and south seas, which depend upon it." In 1805 Nelson attempted to gain possession of this route by aid of a land force, but was prevented by the power of the Spanish. At the time that the question was discussed of the cession of Louisiana to the United States by France Decrès replied to Napoleon that "if the Isthmus of Panama is cut through some day it will occasion an immense revolution in navigation, so that a voyage around the world will be easier than the longest cruise to-day. Louisiana will be on the line of this new route, and its possession will be of inestimable value. Don't give it up."

The subject of this interoceanic canal is of world-wide importance. Many nations have interested themselves in it; many men have given themselves to the study of it; many volumes have been written on it; many lives have been sacrificed to it, and many millions of gold have been spent on it. Over no portion of the earth's surface has the engineer's level been so repeatedly run, and now what ages have waited for the new century is about to witness. What the genius of Columbus failed to find that of modern science is about to create. It is beyond the range of possibilities to follow the important results—geographical, commercial, and political—from this New-World condition. The cutting of the new isthmian canal will be the most important event since the discovery of Australasia, and will reduce the size of the earth at the equator by one-third. No other ship canal ever constructed—not even the Suez—can compare with it in economy in sailing distances.

From London to Canton the Suez saves 3,300 miles, and to Bombay 4,325 miles, while the Panama Canal will save from 5,000 to 6,000 miles for most ships sailing through it; between London and San Francisco it saves nearly 7,200 miles; between New York and San Francisco, 10,080 miles. President Hayes said: "An interoceanic canal will essentially change the geographical relation between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts of the United States, and between the United States and the rest of the world." This canal will project the Pacific coast into the heart of the continent and make it possible to steam from Pittsburg to Hongkong and from Omaha to Sydney. The Mississippi Valley, with its 1,244,000 square miles of area, is considerably larger than the whole of central Europe. On account of its magnitude, its inexhaustible fertility, its great variety of production, the energy of its people, its 5,000 miles of waterways navigable for steamers, and southerly flow of its great artery, it is commercially and politically the most important valley in the world, and its connection with the most important ocean of the future is a great geographical change of the first importance. Seagoing vessels will soon be passing from Chicago and Duluth down the Mississippi to the Pacific.

In 1825 Henry Clay, then Secretary of State, said: "The execution of this work will form a great epoch of the affairs of the whole world." From New York to San Francisco by way of Cape Horn it is 14,840 miles; by way of the Panama Canal it will be only 4,760 miles, a saving of over 10,000 miles and over fifty days' time by freight steamers between those two points, with a corresponding economy to other points on the two coasts. Where two-thirds of the time and distance is saved, there is a corresponding saving of value of repairs, insurance on vessels and cargo, of interest on investment, wages and provisions, and also a two-third cost in saving of transportation; but its saving to existing commerce is by no means all. It will create a vast amount of new commerce. It is impossible, commercially speaking, to transport freight of any sort beyond a point where the cost of transportation exceeds the value of the cargo to a point where it is brought.

ARTICLES OF COMMERCE.

The canal, therefore, by reducing the distance increases the number of articles of commerce. The exports from the Pacific coast are for the most part raw material and will not bear long carriage—for example, lumber, in which the far Northwest is so rich, and the supply of the Eastern States being practically exhausted. Cuba has attempted to import Pacific coast lumber, but found it too expensive. As soon as the canal is cut lumber for building purposes will become an exceedingly important article of commerce between the two coasts. It is estimated by lumbermen that the opening of the canal will add $2 to every thousand feet of lumber standing around Puget Sound. The forests of Washington alone contain 175,000,000,000 feet of uncut yellow and red fir.

LUMBER.

The estimate referred to being a reasonable one, the value of the forests of Washington alone will be enhanced about $350,000,000. The supply in Oregon, British Columbia, and Alaska is much greater. W. H. Seward said of this region: "It seems destined to become a shipyard of supply for all nations."

WHEAT.

When the limit for transportation of wheat from the Pacific coast is reduced twenty-five days' steaming, it will become a mercantile transaction with daily assured profits. At the present time, with a voyage of four or five months around the Horn, taken in relation as to the possible rise and fall of prices which make trade, it is as much a gamble as any hazardous game of chance. Distances on the Pacific coast around Cape Horn are somewhat greater to New York than to Liverpool, and the rich trader of the west coast of Central and South America chiefly goes to Great Britain and Germany, but with the opening of the isthmian canal all this will be changed. The distance will be then from twenty-seven hundred to thirty-five hundred miles in favor of New York, which, with our facilities for manufacture, will give us the market of that coast.

Distances via the Panama Canal.

From—	To New York.	To Liverpool.
	Miles.	Miles.
San Francisco	4,760	7,508
Acapulco	3,122	5,870
Mazatlan	3,682	6,432
Guayaquil	2,340	5,890
Callao	3,713	6,461
Valparaiso	4,700	7,448

THE SOUTHERN STATES.

The Southern States will have a much greater advantage, as New Orleans is 713 miles nearer than New York to the canal, and the almost inexhaustible coal mines of Alabama, so easily worked, can be landed on shipboard at Mobile at $1.25 a ton.

COAL.

Attention is called to the fact that there is but very little coal, and that of inferior quality, on the Pacific coast, and steamers passing through this canal will require 2,000,000 tons per annum, and that will be furnished by Alabama.

PIG IRON.

In Alabama and Tennessee pig iron is produced more cheaply than anywhere else, and in all the markets of the Pacific iron will be in increasing demand for many years to come.

COTTON.

Japan, the greatest manufacturing nation in the Far East, imported some $55,000,000 worth of raw cotton during the past year, and in the same year China imported cotton goods valued at $80,000,000. When the canal is cut ocean steamships can load cotton at the river and gulf docks and sail direct to the Orient, which will enable us to successfully compete with Indian cotton.

FOOD.

Statistics show that with 5 per cent of the world's population we produce 32 per cent of the world's food. The Mississippi Valley is our great granary, and the new waterway will connect it with more than half the population of the globe. Thus the Panama Canal will give the Pacific coast access to the European markets, and our Atlantic and Gulf coasts access to the Asiatic markets. New York is 150 miles farther than Liverpool from Cape Horn. This fact, of course, makes Liverpool 150 miles nearer than New York to all the ports on the eastern shore of the Pacific. Liverpool is as much nearer to all points on the west Pacific coast as Liverpool is nearer than New York to Gibraltar, which is about 2,000 miles; that is to say, that the Pacific, commercially speaking, is now an English ocean. The effect of cutting through the Panama Canal will be to bring New York 2,748 miles nearer than Liverpool to its eastern entrance.

The advantage to the commerce of New York City via the Panama Canal over that of Liverpool via the Suez Canal is best illustrated by the following table of distances:

From—	To New York.	To Liverpool.
	Miles.	Miles.
Shanghai	10,212	10,330
Yokohama	9,227	11,060
Manila	10,662	11,534
Honolulu	6,417	9,167
Auckland	8,462	11,212
Melbourne	10,000	11,000

The Panama Canal is the gateway to the Pacific, and opens upon 500,000,000 of people, whose imports last year were approximately one billion and a half of dollars. The commerce of the Pacific will increase indefinitely and the United States will command a greater part of it.

The Hon. Archibald Colquhoun, an engineer and traveler, in speaking of the canal wrote that—

It will render greater service to the New World than the Suez does to the Old, it will bring Japan, north China, Australasia, and a part of Malaysia nearer to the Atlantic cities of the United States than they are now to England. It will give an immense impulse to the United States manufacturers, especially cotton and iron, and will greatly stimulate the shipbuilding industry and develop the naval power of the United States. Finally, I believe it will, taken in connection with the vast changes occurring in the Far East, bring about the most severe rivalry to the commercial supremacy of England which she has ever yet encountered.

Our entrance into competition for the world's markets, access to those markets, makes it imperative that this canal should be completed in the earliest possible time. With the United States, washed by two great oceans, directly connected by this waterway, the nation will be midway between the markets of the world.

POLITICAL BEARING.

The political effect, obvious of the construction of this canal, will be in uniting our coast lines and bringing the most remote portions of our territory into closer relations. Mr. Colquhoun says:

It will bind together the remote sections of that country, assimilate its diverse interests, and go far toward solving many difficult problems and make the United States still more united.

President Hayes said in one of his messages:

"A part of the coast line of the United States," and a portion in which we shall be vitally concerned. The United States Government ought to control and protect it. The canal must be ours, and we must have a navy strong enough to protect it. By closing it, a foreign power with a single blow would cleave our two coasts 10,000 miles asunder.

In the utilization of the mobile defenses of the United States—

there is no waterway which approaches the isthmian canal. Without it the fleet of one coast is unavailable to the other; with it every naval gun may be turned upon the foe, whether he shall come from the east or the west.

The building of this canal will bring the western coast of South America, which has for a long time seemed very much out of the world, into closer relation with the eastern coast of North America. The principal ports on the western coast of South America will be from sixteen hundred to seventeen hundred miles nearer to New York than San Francisco. These regions of South America have rich undeveloped natural resources and a sparse population, but they will be brought by the canal into close relation with the richest and most densely populated portions of the United States. A large part of the superfluous and rapidly increasing capital of the latter country will find opportunity there. The isthmian canal will give to the West Indies a commercial importance which will involve great political consequences. For hundreds of years these islands were a source of the tropical products, and during the Napoleonic wars furnished Great Britain with one-half of her commerce; but misrule, vicious and tyrannical, and other causes have paralyzed their industries and depleted their commerce, until now it is insignificant. The canal will focus the commerce of the world in the Caribbean Sea. Toward it flow three great rivers, the Hudson, the Mississippi, and the Amazon, and as tributaries to the canal they will pour their commerce through this sea, whose islands will become ports of call.

Capt. A. T. Mahan says:

In the cluster of island fortresses of the Caribbean is one of the great nerve centers of the whole body of European civilization; and I refer to the archipelago as the very domains of the sea power, if ever a region could be called so.

He continues:

Control of a maritime region is insured primarily by a navy, secondly by positions, suitably chosen and spaced one from another, upon which one the navy rests and from which it can exert its strength.

It is important, therefore, in this respect that we should consider the extension of our possessions in the Caribbean Sea, provided they come to us by righteous means. If through an expression of the majority of the people of Cuba that the island should come to be a part of our nation in the future in its relation to the construction of the canal, it will prove of incalculable benefit to us. But let that new Republic be bound to us only by the strongest of bonds—the ties of obligation, respect, and love.

INLAND CANALS.

Bearing a direct relationship with the construction of the Panama Canal there is the improvement and extension of the inland waterways of this great nation. Inland waterways tend to cheapen the cost of carriage and to develop industry, and ought to emphasize strongly the economic importance of inland navigation. They cheapen the rate of transportation not only for the products of the farmer, but to the manufacturer as well. Since 1882 there have been biennial appropriations made for improving our inland waterways. As this is a matter of such vital importance to the people, this policy should be changed and annual appropriations made. These water routes have to a large extent made possible the development of our iron industries. The richest iron regions of the United States, those of northern Michigan and Wisconsin, are nearly 1,000 miles distant from the great coal fields of Pennsylvania, but with a waterway connecting them, on which freight rates are a little over 1 mill a ton-mile, the two mining regions are brought closer together.

The distribution and consumption of coal, both for manufacturing and boating purposes, have been largely increased on account of inland transportation through the Ohio River and the Great Lakes. The improvement and extension of the water routes of the Great Lakes, the Mississippi River system, the Missouri, the construction of the ship canal between the Mississippi River and Lake Michigan, of a lake ship canal from Pittsburg to Lake Erie, of a lake ship canal to St. Paul and Minneapolis, will tend to further distribute coal at a cheaper rate and greatly widen the present marketable limits. The inland waterways are likewise of great importance to the consumer and producer of lumber in the United States. Thus far railroads have been able to transport east from Washington only high-grade shingles to the Mississippi Valley. Farther inland, waterways enable home industries to compete more easily with foreign producers, not only by decreased cost of transportation on articles destined for export, but also by making raw material cheaper. The development of the inland navigation of the United States will assist us in maintaining a high standard of life in competition with Europe.

THE FLORIDA CANAL.

In this connection I desire to call the attention of the House to a measure—House bill 9487, now in the hands of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors—providing for a survey or surveys to be made to determine the feasibility of a canal between the waters of the St. Johns River and the Gulf of Mexico. The construction of this canal is not only of vital importance to the State of Florida, but to the nation at large as well. It means the lessening of distance for freight traffic by coasting and steam vessels between all points on the eastern coast and those on the Gulf and Pacific by over 600 miles. To the shipping interests it would mean a saving of two days in point of time, 600 tons of coal for steamers, lessening freight rates; to the shipper the decrease in both freight and insurance rates, and quicker delivery. Seventy-five per cent of the manufacturing interests shipping their goods to Pensacola, Mobile, New Orleans, and Galveston at present do not insure, for the reason that the insurance exceeds the freight rates.

To the consumer the construction of the canal means a lessening of the cost. One line of steamers operating between the ports of New York, New Orleans, and Galveston during the year 1903 shipped 18,000,000 tons of freight. The importance of this measure may well be understood when this is taken into consideration. Every southern city, as well as all the ports along the eastern coast of the United States, should be vitally concerned in regard to this matter. The wreck coast of the United States for years has been the southerly part of Florida and the tortuous channels of the Florida Keys. No private or corporate interests should be permitted to interfere with the passage of such a measure. The line of the canal suggested would be through the St. Johns River, Doctors Lake, and the Waccassie River on the Gulf side. The cost of construction is comparatively small when the fact is taken into consideration that valuable deposits of phosphates, which are salable as fertilizer, are to be found along the proposed line, and also that the lands are heavily timbered. This is one of the many projects of a similar nature which should receive the attention of the National Legislature.

THE WATERWAYS IN AND ABOUT NEW YORK CITY.

The improvement of the waterways in and about New York City, the commercial center of the country, means to a great degree enhancing the prosperity of the entire nation. The commerce of New York, as given by the Bureau of Statistics, Department of Commerce and Labor, show imports, $574,066,854; all other ports in the United States, $409,507,602; aggregate exports, New York, $558,388,935; all others, $889,625,613. This expressed in tons, foreign commerce, New York, 17,398,058; coasting trade, 20,000,000; making a total of 37,564,108 tons. The customs revenue in the city of New York is 65.01 per cent of the total collected in the United States. The improvement of the Harlem River Ship Canal and the Harlem River and Bronx Kills to the deep waters of the Sound and the ocean mean much toward increasing the commerce of the metropolis.

Not only these improvements, but the measure, House bill 9486, providing for a survey or surveys to be made to determine the feasibility of a canal between Flushing Bay and Newtown Creek, county of Queens, State of New York, has an important bearing on the development of the various channels in and about New York. The fabulous sums expended in blowing out Hell Gate in order to open up a channel for passing vessels have not as yet achieved the object sought, and the money spent at Hell Gate would have been more than sufficient to construct the Newtown Creek and Flushing Bay Canal, and provide a broad and clear channel for vessels from the East River and the Sound. All Long Island and the East River section would be immensely benefited by this canal, and it is for this reason that it possesses a national character and that Congress may rightly and properly authorize an expenditure for its construction.

New York is the greatest seaboard terminus and port for international trade for the world, and any project which gives increased value to this port materially benefits every section of the United States. This canal is a scheme which originated with DeWitt Clinton, who saw in the future that the trend of population in this great center of the western world would be toward what are now known as the boroughs of the Bronx and Queens, and that the food supply and material for the well-being of the people would necessarily be delivered at a cheaper rate by the construction of such a waterway. The cost of this work is comparatively small, as the Geological Survey shows an alluvial soil along the entire route and that no blasting will be required.

Enormous sums have been expended by the United States Government in dredging Newtown Creek in the endeavor to maintain an 18-foot channel for a distance of about 2¾ miles. With every recurring tide, débris and refuse are deposited and the channel becomes rapidly shallower, and it is now estimated that the work done by the Department of War, and declared practically completed by that Department, June 30, 1903, has failed of its object to such an extent that the channel is only 14 feet at the present time. There is no stream of its size in the United States where such a quantity of freight is handled as in Newtown Creek. The estimated amount is in excess of 3,000,000 tons annually and consists mainly of coal, building materials, oils, and chemicals.

The construction of this canal would mean the constant flushing of the creek and the maintenance of a channel of proper depth with little or no cost to the United States Government, and at the same time would greatly enhance the value of the commerce of New York City.

The project proposed is analogous to that of the canal or waterway across Keweenaw Point from Keweenaw Bay to Lake Superior. This canal was purchased by the United States September 19, 1890, and deepened from 13 feet to 20 feet at an outlay of $1,243,996.56 up to June 30, 1902. During the season of navigation in 1901, 2,114,385 net tons of freight were carried through this canal, valued at $57,876,480. This waterway, uniting Portage Lake and Lake Superior, is under Government control. The increasing congestion of traffic on the East River, causing an increase in loss by collision and accidents occurring from crowding of the waterway, will ultimately compel the deepening and extension of every outlet, including the Newtown Creek. The damage done by the sinking of a vessel or two every week or so in the course of a short time amounts to far more than the total expense necessary to construct this canal and to make and maintain this channel. A farsighted policy would, therefore, dictate steps which would prevent a recurrence of such losses to commerce.

While considering this particularly interesting subject, I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that, despite the statement that has recently been made that "the United States Government is not in the canal-building business," the following canals are directly maintained or were constructed by the United States Government, and the gross amount of tonnage compares in no wise to that which would pass through the canals mentioned in the preceding parts of this address.

Government-built canals.

Name.	Length.	Tonnage.
Bee Tree Shoals, Alabama	8 miles	210,264
Cascades, Oregon	3,462 feet	19,710
Duluth (Duluth-Superior)		12,973,373
Illinois and Mississippi Canal (Illinois)	4¼ miles	1,473
Keweenaw Point, Mich. (Portage Lake)		2,114,385
Louisville and Portland, Mosquito Creek, South Carolina.	2 miles	847,710
Seattle, Wash		210,565
St. Marys Falls Canal (Michigan)	1¾ miles	34,674,437

All of these projects are worthy of the most careful and earnest consideration of the National Government. The improvement of our waterways is a matter of the gravest concern, not only to the producers, but to the consumers as well. It means a lessening of the cost of marketing products and cheapening prices. In the words of the Cullom Commission:

> The manufacturing destiny of our country points unerringly to the emancipation of the waters as its next great work, a fitting sequel to the emancipation of the slave, a destiny not of war, but of beneficence and peace to which the heart of the nation turns as spontaneously and resistlessly as the waters of its great river flow to the Gulf.

Already in every part of the world the commercial supremacy of the United States is being recognized, and every effort which is made on the part of the National Government to increase its commerce without artificial means tends toward the well-being of the entire people. The building of canals—the Panama Canal, the Florida Canal, improving the Harlem Ship Canal and the Bronx Kills Canal, the Newtown Creek and Flushing Bay Canal, the construction of a canal south of Cape Cod, of a canal connecting the waters of the Delaware River with the Chesapeake Bay, the improvement and extension of all our great inland waterways—means much to our people in that they act as a check on the greed of corporate interests in railways, lessen the cost of freight, and be of great and lasting benefit.

Signs of the times indicate that this nation is about to play a part which it has never taken before in the life of the people of the entire world, and that its usefulness will be greater and greater. Every effort tending toward furthering the interests of the people will increase the power of the nation. Through its commerce, not by force of arms, there will be carried to the nations of the world a message of liberty and freedom that will prove an incentive toward a higher and better world life. Our flag will then represent in government what the cross of Christ represents in religion—all that is highest and noblest and best. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, does any gentleman on that side desire to consume any time now?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] has consumed all of his time.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Then I yield such time as remains to this side to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BAKER]. I believe it is fourteen minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BAKER] is recognized for fourteen minutes.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Chairman, a few days ago, on one of the three occasions when gentlemen from the great State of Ohio annihilated the present speaker, in response to the second of those speeches, that of Judge GOEBEL, of Cincinnati, I made an impromptu statement, because my reply to the gentleman's remarks was offhand and entirely unpremeditated. I said then that in the city of Cincinnati, governed by George B. Cox, that impeccable gentleman who has been so highly extolled three times upon this floor during the last few weeks, that in that city and under his administration—because he is the real mayor despite all the laudation on this floor of Mr. Fleischmann—that there were sixty-four men registered from one room in which sixty-four men could not stand erect.

It appears that I have overstated the case, and as I have no desire to place the matter in any other light than is warranted by the facts, because we are always told when these charges are made that it is an attack upon the fair fame of Cincinnati. You never must say anything about corruption; you never must say anything about wrong; you never must say anything about misgovernment; you must not discuss the question of illegal or fraudulent registration, because if you do the fair fame of that city has been attacked.

It appears from the statement that I hold in my hand that so far from sixty-four men being registered from 13 Gano alley, as I then said, there were forty-five men registered on the first registration day in last October. Investigation reveals the fact that 13 Gano alley consists of two rooms, one 14 feet square and the other somewhat smaller. The only pieces of furniture in these two rooms were two chairs without any backs and an old cannon stove. So that even under the correction of the statement made here, it is probable it was true when I said it was not possible for sixty-four men to stand erect in that room.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to take up the time of the House. It is of no interest, I am sure, to my Republican friends, for they will ignore it; but I shall ask unanimous consent to insert as a part of my remarks a letter from Mr. Benton S. Oppenheimer, of that city, a statement by him about the illegal registering in Cincinnati and the great difficulty that has been placed in the way of the men who attempted to purge the registration lists by the boards of election in Cincinnati, composed of Republicans and so-called Democrats.

I also ask permission to insert two speeches delivered by the gentleman from Cincinnati [Mr. GOEBEL], one on the 12th of October, 1897, and the other on May 29, 1899, in which in as scathing language as any man could use he denounced George B. Cox, then, as now, the boss of the Republican city of Cincinnati.

I also wish to incorporate in my remarks part of an article which appeared in Frank Leslie's Monthly, written by a gentleman who is well known here as a correspondent of one of the Cincinnati papers, in which he describes in very lucid language the power of this private gentleman, George B. Cox, who rules the city of Cincinnati. For illustration: He asked him a question on one occasion as to what reason he ascribed his success. He replied: "I use my own judgment as to the class of candidates most acceptable to the people."

George B. Cox thus asserts that he determines who shall be candidates upon the Republican ticket in the city of Cincinnati. A little later on a State convention is held, and from this report, among other officers, candidates for attorney-general were to be nominated. Mr. Daugherty was to be a candidate, and this gentleman says to Mr. Cox, "How many votes are you going to give to Daugherty?" "Not any," says Mr. Cox in a gruff voice. The gentleman says he protested against that and told Mr. Cox, "Daugherty and I are friends and I wanted to have a vote cast for him." Another gentleman said he was in the same condition of mind. Mr. Cox then said, "I will give him eight votes." This governor of the city of Cincinnati to these assembled gentlemen said, "I will give him eight votes." Without consulting any of the members, without consulting any of the men who had seats in that convention from Cincinnati, he gave eight votes to Daugherty.

A gentleman, Mr. Bellamy Storer, was once a Member of this House. He desired to be renominated by the Republican party and Mr. Cox's statement as to this is also given. He was asked this question: "Why did you turn out Mr. Bellamy Storer?" "Bellamy Storer served two terms," says Mr. Cox. "After his first campaign he gave me no credit whatever for his nomination."

Then he gives some details unnecessary to repeat. He then says Mr. Storer came to him and explained, and he told Storer, "No matter what differences there are between you and me, it is the custom to give a Congressman a second term and I shall not depart from that custom."

That's George B. Cox, the boss of the Republican party, the party that boasts of being the party of Abraham Lincoln. All right. Mr. Storer goes away. Mr. Cox complained that he (Storer) had presided over the State convention, but did not come to see him (Cox). Mr. Storer's friends saw him berore the convention and told him it was all right—he would be nominated. He took the advice of those friends and did not again call upon Cox, showing, as Cox says, "that he was willing to ignore me." What did George B. Cox do? He then sent to Charles P. Taft and asked him to accept the nomination, and next day he was nominated by acclamation. That is the act of the real governor of the great Republican city of Cincinnati.

Mr. Chairman, I ask permission to insert these in the RECORD.

Mr. PALMER. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to insert the matter named in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. PALMER. I object.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Chairman, I give notice right here and now that hereafter there will be no unanimous consents for extension of remarks in the RECORD. [Applause.]

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order against the objection that the gentleman did not object by rising in his seat.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman insists on that point of order the Chair will have to sustain it. The gentleman did not rise and address the Chair.

Mr. BAKER. Is my time used up, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The time has not expired. The gentleman has seven minutes remaining. The Chair will again put the request of the gentleman from New York. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting the matter to which he has referred. Is there objection?

Mr. PALMER. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania objects.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LAMAR] neglected before he sat down to ask permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD. I wish to ask unanimous consent that he may have that leave.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri may have leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I wish to ask that permission for all gentlemen who have addressed the House on this bill.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Within what time?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. About five days.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Georgia that it is not the rule to grant general leave to those who have addressed the House to extend their remarks in the RECORD. The rule is to recognize individual requests.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I beg to say that it has been done ever since I have been in the House—for twelve or fourteen years.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to say to the gentleman that that is never done in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Very well; I withdraw the request.

The CHAIRMAN. As a matter of fact, under the rule it is questionable whether the Committee of the Whole has power to grant unanimous consent for extensions by individual Members.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I now renew my request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LAMAR] be permitted to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to ask, as a parliamentary inquiry, whether it will be in order for me to move that I may be allowed to extend my remarks in the RECORD, so as to include a portion of the article I have not read?

The CHAIRMAN. In answer to the gentleman from New York the Chair will state that it will not be in order for him to move that he be permitted to extend his remarks in the RECORD, as requested.

Mr. BAKER. Then I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. PALMER. My objection was to putting in two speeches made by somebody or other and a magazine article. That is what I objected to. I did not object to the gentleman extending his own remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The request for unanimous consent has been made before the committee twice, and objection has been made.

Mr. BAKER. I have no desire to incorporate this article in my remarks, but simply to incorporate two paragraphs which I did not inflict upon the House. That is all. I commenced the article about four-fifths of the way through.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York has yielded the floor and is not in order unless speaking on some other subject.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana moves that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TAWNEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 10954, the urgent deficiency bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, referred to the Committee on the Library, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I herewith lay before the Congress a letter from the Polish organizations of the United States and the report thereon from Col. Thomas W. Symons, superintendent of public buildings and grounds. In view of the recommendation of Colonel Symons, I advise that the very patriotic offer of the Polish organizations be accepted, and that instead of the statue of Pulaski (which, in the judgment of his Polish compatriots, should be an equestrian statue, and which it is now proposed to place in reservation 33, on the north side of Pennsylvania avenue, between Thirteenth and Fourteenth streets) there be a pedestrian statue of Kosciusko accepted by the Government, to be placed on one of the four corners of Lafayette square. These four corners would thus ultimately be occupied by statues of Lafayette, Rochambeau, Von Steuben, and Kosciusko, all of whom in the stormy days which saw the birth of the Republic rendered service which can never be forgotten by our people.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

WHITE HOUSE, January 28, 1904.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, Mr. WEEMS was given leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of William Welsh, Fifty-seventh Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. CUSHMAN for three days, on account of important business.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of War, submitting a report on the expenditures of recent appropriations for construction, equipment, and maintenance of buildings at military posts and stations for the conduct of post exchange, school, library, amusements, etc.—to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of War submitting an estimate of appropriation for a highway bridge across the Potomac—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of the Navy submitting a revised estimate of appropriation for naval station at Olongapo, P. I.—to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Civil Service Commission submitting an estimate of appropriation for traveling expenses—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of War, submitting papers relating to the claim of the Mitsui Bussan Kaisha, a Japanese corporation—to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination and survey of Willamette River opposite Albany, Oreg.—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of State, transmitting, with inclosures, a recommendation that authority be given to invite the International Congress of Hygiene and Demography to meet in Washington in 1909—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Brown Post, No. 151, of Sheldon; of Hiram McClintock Post, No. 667, of La Grange; of Robert Hale Post, No. 556, of Fulton; of Brewer Post, No. 577, of Walnut; of Rochelle Post, No. 546, of Rochelle; of Vennum Post, No. 796, of Milford, and of Pulaski Post, No. 796, of Pulaski, all of the Department of Illinois, Grand Army of the Republic, in the State of Illinois, praying for the enactment of a service-pension law; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FOSTER of Washington presented a petition of the Good Roads' Association of Island County, Wash., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the construction of good roads in the country; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of the congregation of the German Methodist Episcopal Church, of Walla Walla, Wash., and a petition of the congregation of the First Cumberland Presbyterian Church, of Walla Walla, Wash., praying for an investigation of the charges made and filed against Hon. REED SMOOT, a Senator from the State of Utah; which were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. STONE presented a petition of the Ministerial Association of Springfield, Mo., praying for the enactment of legislation to prevent nullification of State liquor laws and no-license ordinances by so-called "original-package" and other "interstate-commerce" tricks; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of Mound City Council, No. 207, United Commercial Travelers, of St. Louis, Mo., praying for the adoption of an amendment to section 64 of the present bankruptcy law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. S OTT presented a petition of the congregation of the Methodist Episcopal Church and the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Amos, W. Va., praying for an investigation of the charges made and filed against Hon. REED SMOOT, a Senator from the State of Utah; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. HEYBURN presented sundry papers to accompany the bill (S. 3788) to provide for an examination to determine the feasibility of reclaiming the overflowed lands of the Kootenai River in northern Idaho and Montana; which were referred to the Committee on the Geological Survey.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I present a petition of about 150 leading citizens of New Haven, comprising business men, professional men, and professors of Yale College, praying for a ratification of the Hay-Varilla treaty. I suppose it is really a matter for executive session, but as the treaty has been made public I think I may present it in the open session. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FRYE presented petitions of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Fairfield and of the congregation of the First Baptist Church of Fairfield, in the State of Maine, and of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Enfield, N. C., praying for an investigation of the charges made and filed against Hon. REED SMOOT, a Senator from the State of Utah; which were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

PRESERVATION OF FRIGATE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. HOAR. I present a memorial of the Massachusetts Historical Society, Charles F. Adams, president, and others, relative to the preservation of the U. S. frigate Constitution. The memorial relates to a matter of great historical interest. I understand that it was written by Mr. Charles F. Adams. It states the case in his accustomed admirable fashion. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Memorial.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

Your memorialists, the Council of the Massachusetts Historical Society, acting under its instructions, would respectfully call the attention of your honorable bodies to certain facts connected with the United States frigate Constitution.

That vessel is now lying at Charlestown, Mass., in a dock also used by the steamships of the so-called White Star Line; she is dismantled, out of repair, and liable at any time to injury from carelessness or accident, if not to destruction. Your memorialists further represent that in the American mind an historical interest attaches to the Constitution such as attaches to no other ship in maritime annals except, possibly, the Santa Maria, the flagship of Columbus, and the Mayflower, both of which disappeared centuries ago. The Constitution still remains; and it was the Constitution which, in the gloomiest hour of the war of 1812-1814, appeared "like a bright gleam in the darkness." On the 16th of August of that year Detroit, with all its garrisons, munitions, and defenses, was surrendered to the British forces; on the same day Fort Dearborn, at what is now Chicago, was in flames, and with it "the last vestige of American authority on the Western Lakes disappeared." The discouragement was universal, and the sense of national humiliation extreme; for it seemed doubtful if even the interior line of the Wabash could be successfully held against an enemy flushed with success. The prophet of yet other disasters immediately impending was abroad, and, according to his wont, further depressed the already disheartened land. It was in this hour of deepest gloom that, on the morning of Sunday, August 30, the Sabbath silence of Boston was broken and the town stirred to unwonted excitement "as the news passed through the quiet streets that the Constitution was below, in the outer harbor, with Dacres," of the Guerriere, "and his crew of prisoners on board." Thus it so chanced that the journal which the next morning informed Bostonians of the Detroit humiliation in another column of the same issue announced that naval action which, "however small the affair might appear on the general scale of the world's battles, raised the United States in one-half hour to the rank of a first-class power in the world." The jealousy of the Navy, which had until then characterized the more recent national policy, vanished forever "in the flash of Hull's first broadside." The victory, moreover, was most dramatic—a naval duel. The adversaries—not only commanders, but ship's companies to a man—had sought each other out for a test of seamanship, discipline, and gunnery; arrogance and the confidence of prestige on the one side, a passionate sense of wrong on the other. They met in mid-Atlantic—frigate to frigate. It was on the afternoon of August 19, the wind blowing fresh, the sea running high. For about an hour the two ships maneuvered for position; but at last, a few minutes before 6 o'clock, "they came together side by side, within pistol shot, the wind almost astern, and, running before it, they pounded each other with all their strength. As rapidly as the guns could be worked the Constitution poured in broadside after broadside, double-shotted with round and grape; and, without exaggeration, the echo of those guns startled the world." Of her first broadside in that action the master of an American brig, then a captive on board the British ship, afterwards wrote: "About 6 o'clock I heard a tremendous explosion from the opposing frigate. The effect of her shot seemed to make the Guerriere reel and tremble as though she had received the shock of an earthquake." "In less than 30 minutes from the time we got alongside of the enemy," reported Captain Hull to the Secretary of the Navy, "she was left without a spar standing and the hull cut to pieces in such a manner as to make it difficult to keep her above water."

The historian has truly said of that conflict: "Isaac Hull was nephew to the unhappy General [who, three days before the Constitution overcame the Guerriere, had capitulated at Detroit], and perhaps the shattered hulk of the Guerriere, which the nephew left at the bottom of the Atlantic Ocean, 800 miles east of Boston, was worth for the moment the whole province which the uncle had lost, 800 miles to the westward. * * * No experience of history ever went to the heart of New England more directly than this victory, so peculiarly its own; but the delight was not confined to New England, and extreme though it seemed, it was still not extravagant."

Therefore it is that the Massachusetts Historical Society, already in 1812 an organization more than twenty years in existence, now directs this memorial to be submitted, she, the oldest among them, speaking through her council for all other similar societies throughout New England. In so doing, it is needless to enter into the earlier and later history of what was essentially the "fighting frigate" of the first American Navy; for, in the memory of the people of the United States, the Constitution is, throughout her long record, inseparably associated with feats of daring and seamanship—devotion and dash—than which none in all naval history are more skillful, more stirring, or more deserving of commemoration. How can they be so effectively commemorated as by the pious and lasting preservation of the ancient ship, now slowly rotting at the wharf opposite to which she was launched six years more than a century ago?

And while the name of the Constitution is thus not only synonymous with courage, seamanship, patriotism, and unbroken triumph, the ship herself is typical of a maritime architecture as extinct as the galley or the trireme. She slid from the ways at what is still known in her honor as Constitution Wharf, in Boston Harbor, ten months before Nelson won the battle of the Nile and eight years to a day before his famous flagship, the Victory, bore his broad pennant in triumph through the Franco-Spanish line off Trafalgar; and your memorialists hold that, in the eyes and minds of the people of the United States, no less an interest and sentiment attach to the Constitution than in Great Britain attach to the Victory. The Constitution in the days of our deep tribulation did more for us than ever even the flagship of Nelson did for England, and thenceforth she has been to Americans as a sentient being, to whom gratitude is due.

Yet by Great Britain the Victory ever has been and now is tenderly cared for and jealously preserved among the most precious of national memorials. As such, it is yearly visited by thousands, among whom Americans are not least in number. The same care has not been extended over the Constitution, and yet your memorialists would not for a moment suggest, nor do they believe, that the people, the Parliament, or the Government of Great Britain are more grateful, more patriotic, or endowed with a keener sense of pride than the people, the Congress, or the Administration of the United States. As for the people, the contrary is, in case of the Constitution, incontrovertibly proven by the names of the thousands of pilgrims from all sections of the country annually inscribed on her register. So far as the Government is concerned, its failure to take measures for the lasting preservation of the old ship has been due, in the opinion of your memorialists, neither to indifference nor to an unworthy spirit of thrift, but to the fact that, amid the multifarious matters calling for immediate action, the preserving of an old-time frigate, even though freighted with glorious memories, has been somewhat unduly, though not perhaps unnaturally, deferred to a more opportune occasion.

None the less, the Constitution "is the yet living monument not alone of her own victories, but of the men behind the guns who won them. She speaks to us of patriotism and courage, of the devotion to an idea and to a sentiment for which men laid down their lives." Therefore your memorialists would respectfully ask that immediate provision be made to the end that the course pursued by the British Admiralty in the case of the Victory may be pursued by our Navy Department in the case of the Constitution. We accordingly pray your honorable bodies that the necessary steps forthwith be taken for preserving the "fighting frigate" of 1812; that she be renewed, put in commission as a training ship, and at suitable seasons be in future stationed at points along our coast where she may be easily accessible to that large and ever-increasing number of American citizens who, retaining a sense of affection as well as deep gratitude to her, feel also a patriotic and an abiding interest in the associations she will never cease to recall.

And your memorialists will ever pray, etc.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BURNHAM, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2547) for the relief of the owners and crew of the schooner Ella M. Doughty, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. WARREN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3626) to regulate the employment of officers of the Army on the retired list, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 803) for the relief of John Stewart, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. STONE, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7620) defining the limit of navigation of the Osage River in the State of Missouri, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. LONG, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 713) for the relief of Rev. Charles Wright, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1633) permitting the Kiowa, Chickasha and Fort Smith Railway Company to sell and convey their railroads and other property in the Indian Territory to the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railway Company, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2268) to authorize the Absentee Wyandotte Indians to select certain lands, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. QUARLES, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1426) to prevent the desecration of the American flag, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the Committee on the Census, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3292) amendatory of an act entitled "An act to provide for a permanent Census Office," approved March 6, 1902, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3842) to amend an act entitled "An act amending the civil code of Alaska providing for the organization of private corporations, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1903, to ask to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Territories. The civil code of Alaska was considered and reported by the Committee on Territories, which committee also had under consideration this subject of corporations in the last Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Committee on the Judiciary will be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and it will be referred to the Committee on Territories, there being no objection.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3597) for the relief of Vincenzo Gerardi, of Washington, D. C., reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1974) amending the act of Congress approved January 26, 1895, entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to correct errors where double allotments of land have erroneously been made to an Indian, to correct errors in patents, and for other purposes," reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. SCOTT, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2434) providing for a superintendent of the fire department of the District of Columbia, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. FOSTER of Washington, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2884) to amend section 895 of the code of law for the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PROCTOR, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8748) for the relief of Serenus Kilbourne, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3828) to provide for the settlement of certain claims of officers and enlisted men of the Army for the loss or destruction, without fault or negligence on the part of said officers and men, of property belonging to them in the military service of the United States, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. FULTON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2021) for the relief of John Wesley Hoyt, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

ALFONSO ZELAYA.

Mr. PROCTOR. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 34) authorizing the Secretary of War to receive for instruction at the Military Academy at West Point Alfonso Zelaya, of Nicaragua, to report it favorably without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the joint resolution; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LOUISIANA PURCHASE EXPOSITION.

Mr. BURNHAM. In the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Printing, I report for him with a favorable recommendation the amendment of the House of Representatives to the concurrent resolution providing for the printing of copies of the statement of receipts and expenditures of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition, and I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the concurrent resolution.

The amendment of the House was, to strike out all after the resolving clause and to insert:

That the Public Printer be authorized and directed to print and bind in paper covers 15,000 additional copies of the statement of the receipts and expenditures of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition from the date of incorporation to September 30, 1903, with the accompanying report submitted by the national commission of said exposition, of which 5,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 10,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

Mr. BURNHAM. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BURNHAM introduced a bill (S. 3933) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish circuit courts of appeals and to define and regulate in certain cases the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1891; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FOSTER of Washington introduced a bill (S. 3945) granting an increase of pension to Lewis Lewis; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3946) granting an increase of pension to Jesse Bright; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HOAR introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 3947) granting an increase of pension to A. L. Kneeland;

A bill (S. 3948) granting a pension to Thomas O'Connor;

A bill (S. 3949) granting an increase of pension to Benjamin F. Spear; and

A bill (S. 3950) granting an increase of pension to Edward Blaisdell.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. 3951) to correct the military record of Michael J. Kelley; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DEPEW introduced a bill (S. 3952) for the relief of James E. Simpson, jr., Alfred H. Simpson, and Willie E. Simpson, surviving copartners of the firm of J. E. Simpson & Co.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. GALLINGER introduced a bill (S. 3953) granting an increase of pension to Thomas L. Sanborn; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HEYBURN introduced a bill (S. 3954) providing for the deposit of a model of any vessel of war of the United States Navy bearing the name of a State or city of the United States in the capitol building or city hall of said State or city; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3955) granting a pension to Amelia Xandry; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. McCREARY introduced a bill (S. 3956) granting an increase of pension to Patrick Fleming; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3957) granting a pension to Isabel F. Easum; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FRYE introduced a bill (S. 3958) granting an increase of pension to Julia A. Daily; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENT TO URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FORAKER submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $2,000 to pay the superintendent of insurance of the District of Columbia the balance of his salary due from July 1, 1902, and from July 1, 1903, as fixed by the amended code of law of the District of Columbia, approved June 30, 1902, intended to be proposed by him to the urgent deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. HANSBROUGH submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be, and the same is hereby, authorized to employ during the Fifty-eighth Congress a stenographer, from time to time as may be necessary, to report such hearings as may be had by the committee or its subcommittees in connection with any matter which may be before the committee, the expense thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and that the committee be authorized to have such hearings printed.

LAND IN ST. AUGUSTINE, FLA., FOR SCHOOL PURPOSES.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3479) making provision for conveying in fee certain public grounds in the city of St. Augustine, Fla., for school purposes.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Education and Labor with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That any conveyance heretofore or hereafter made by the mayor of St. Augustine, Fla., to the board of public instruction of St. John County, Fla., of that certain tract or parcel of ground situate in the said city of St. Augustine, Fla., known as the "old burnt hospital lot," heretofore conveyed by the United States Government to the mayor of St. Augustine, Fla., in trust for school purposes, be, and the same is hereby, authorized, ratified, and confirmed; and the title in and to said lot, upon such conveyance being made, shall vest the title to said ground in fee in the board of public instruction of St. John County, Fla., aforesaid. And the said board of public instruction of St. John County, Fla., is hereby authorized to sell and convey said lot of ground, and to use and appropriate the proceeds thereof in the erection and construction of a public school building in said city of St. Augustine, Fla.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DIPLOMATIC CORRESPONDENCE RELATIVE TO PANAMA, ETC.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution submitted by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution 104, by Mr. CULBERSON, requesting the President to inform the Senate whether all correspondence, etc., between the Department of State and the legation of the United States at Bogota has been sent to the Senate.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. McLAURIN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Mississippi has yielded to me for a few moments.

Mr. President, in the discussion yesterday something was said in regard to what occurred in the Administration of President Cleveland, and it was attempted to make that a precedent for a refusal to pass this resolution. That was an entirely different case. I read from the Journal of the Senate, which shows the view, and what was the subject-matter of the controversy there. Here is a resolution that was passed by the Senate on the 18th of February, 1886. It was reported by Senator Edmunds:

Resolved, That it is, under these circumstances, the duty of the Senate to refuse its advice and consent to proposed removals of officers the documents and papers in reference to the supposed official or personal misconduct of whom are withheld by the Executive or any head of a Department when deemed necessary by the Senate and called for in considering the matter.

That shows the gist of the contention at that time. Now, I read from Mr. Cleveland's message of March 1, 1886, on page 350 of the Journal of that time. I will read only a few extracts, simply to show what was the contention:

While, therefore, I am constrained to deny the right of the Senate to the papers and documents described, so far as the right to the same is based upon the claim that they are in any view of the subject official, I am also led unequivocally to dispute the right of the Senate, by the aid of any documents whatever, or in any way save through the judicial process of trial on impeachment, to review or reverse the acts of the Executive in the suspension, during the recess of the Senate, of Federal officials.

I believe the power to remove or suspend such officials is vested in the President alone by the Constitution, which in express terms provides that "the executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America," and that "he shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed."

The Senate belongs to the legislative branch of the Government. When the Constitution by express provision superadded to its legislative duties the right to advise and consent to appointments to office and to sit as a court of impeachment, it conferred upon that body all the control and regulation of Executive action supposed to be necessary for the safety of the people; and this express and special grant of such extraordinary powers, not in any way related to or growing out of general Senatorial duty, and in itself a departure from the general plan of our Government, should be held, under a familiar maxim of construction, to exclude every other right of interference with Executive functions.

In the first Congress which assembled after the adoption of the Constitution, comprising many who aided in its preparation, a legislative construction was given to that instrument in which the independence of the Executive in the matter of removals from office was fully sustained.

Now, about the law of 1867, Mr. Cleveland said:

> The first enactment of this description was passed under a stress of partisanship and political bitterness which culminated in the President's impeachment.
> This law provided that the Federal officers to which it applied could only be suspended during the recess of the Senate when shown by evidence satisfactory to the President to be guilty of misconduct in office, or crime, or when incapable or disqualified to perform their duties, and that within twenty day's after the next meeting of the Senate it should be the duty of the President "to report to the Senate such suspension, with the evidence and reasons for his action in the case."
> This statute, passed in 1867, when Congress was overwhelmingly and bitterly opposed politically to the President, may be regarded as an indication that even then it was thought necessary by a Congress determined upon the subjugation of the Executive to legislative will to furnish itself a law for that purpose, instead of attempting to reach the object intended by an invocation of any pretended constitutional right.
> The requests and demands which by the score have for nearly three months been presented to the different Departments of the Government, whatever may be their form, have but one complexion. They assume the right of the Senate to sit in judgment upon the exercise of my exclusive discretion and executive function, for which I am solely responsible to the people from whom I have so lately received the sacred trust of office. My oath to support and defend the Constitution, my duty to the people who have chosen me to execute the powers of their great office and not to relinquish them, and my duty to the Chief Magistracy, which I must preserve unimpaired in all its dignity and vigor, compel me to refuse compliance with these demands.

Mr. President, this is not that case. There is no parallel between them. That was in regard to removals from office. That was the main contention. I am far from any desire to encroach upon the constitutional prerogatives of the President. I believe that the perpetuity of our institutions and of our Government will depend upon keeping the different branches of the Government separate and distinct, that the legislative branch should not encroach upon the executive branch nor upon the judiciary, nor should either of them encroach upon the rights of the legislative branch.

Mr. President, under our Constitution the President has the right to remove an incumbent from office, and we can ask him no questions about it. That has been determined from the beginning. But when it comes to a finished act, in which the concurrence of the Senate is necessary, the Senate has a right, a constitutional right, to all the papers and documents relating to that question. I do not think there can be any doubt of this.

I was very much astonished that the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] took such a broad position in regard to it. I say we have no right whatever to inquire of the President, to demand of him anything in regard to an unfinished matter. If he is about to negotiate a treaty, we have no right to inquire what he is doing. We have no right to do anything of the kind. But when he has negotiated a treaty and that treaty has to be ratified by the Senate before it becomes effective, and we have to advise and consent to its ratification, we then have a right to know why he did it and what are the papers in regard to it. That, I say, is a clear right, and I do not believe there is any President who will refuse it.

This resolution is not for the purpose of casting any reflections upon the present Executive. There is no such intention. It is simply that we ask what are all the papers now in regard to this transaction. There is nothing upon the record which shows that the President has transmitted all of them. He has not said so. We do not know whether there are any not transmitted or not. If there are any, we should like to see them. Such a request never has been refused, I believe, in a solitary instance. The information can be given to us, and it must be confidential. This resolution asks that it be given to us in confidence—that it be given to the Senate in executive session.

Now, where is the instance when such a request has been refused? Suppose it is a very important matter; have we not had precedents in the past? Have we not had them here? Have not Senators now upon this floor seen a case in which a paper was sent here confidentially and exhibited, and that paper is not to be found upon any record? It is not upon our records here. It is not in any printed publication. It is not in any one of the numerous communications that were made to the Senate in regard to the transaction about which it was furnished us. There are other instances in the history of the country.

If there is anything that the President does not think at this time it would be judicious to make public, still he ought to communicate it to us. He can send the original paper here and we will treat it, as it always has been treated when such communications have been made to us, in the strictest confidence, and no record will be made of it.

This is not an encroachment, in my judgment, upon the rights of the Executive in any shape, manner, or form. If it were I would not support it. I believe the distinction is clear and must be apparent to anyone who will examine it. We have no right to make inquiries when it is a matter that is being negotiated—when we are not called upon to do or say anything about it.

But when the act is consummated, when the treaty is agreed upon, and it can not become effective until we have advised and consented to it by the requisite vote in this body, we have the right, then, before we give our advice, before we give our consent, to know the whole transaction in regard to it; and if any of the papers are of such a character that it might not be wise and prudent just at this time that they should be made public, let them be communicated to us in confidence, as has been done heretofore in matters of very great importance and of a very confidential nature.

Therefore, I shall support this resolution without the words the Senator from Illinois has proposed to insert in it. I do not think that they are at all necessary.

Mr. MITCHELL. May I ask the Senator from Missouri a question?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL. Conceding that this is not a parallel case to that under the Cleveland Administration, and I concede that it is entirely different so far as that is concerned, conceding that it is a different case, can not the Senator from Missouri conceive of a case where we have a right to call upon the President to furnish papers wherein it might not be consistent with the public interest to furnish the papers?

Mr. COCKRELL. I will say that probably in nine-tenths of the cases in which Congress might call upon him it would be eminently proper to insert the words "if not incompatible with the public interest." But this is not one of those cases. We are not discussing that kind of a case.

Mr. MITCHELL. Can not the Senator see that even in the consideration of a treaty in reference to which the papers are called for, as in this case, there might be certain papers covered by the resolution that it might not be proper to furnish?

Mr. COCKRELL. I have said that there might be such a case, and I have shown the Senate two cases, practically—I have not named them, but you are all familiar with them—where information was called for, and it was thought by the Executive proper to give it out, and yet the paper itself was sent here. We had it here for inspection, and no record was ever made of it.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator from Missouri admits that we have a right to call for these papers, and he admits further that there might be a case where it would be improper and not consistent with the public interest to furnish certain papers.

Mr. COCKRELL. No.

Mr. MITCHELL. Why not then insert the amendment of the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. COCKRELL. No; I did not say it would be improper to furnish them. I say it is right that he should furnish them; but he can furnish them as has been done heretofore. He can send a paper here to the Senate and let the Senate examine it, though he does not want to commit it to a record which may be made for future reference. Let it be sent here and examined and be considered confidential if there is anything in it which is of a confidential nature. We have a right, I say, as a part of the executive authority in completing our part of this treaty, to the information which the President has, and if he does not want to communicate it to us in a public way he has precedents—several of them—for sending the information to us here in a confidential way and letting us examine it.

Mr. MITCHELL. But would it not be the more courteous and appropriate way to first insert in the resolution "if not inconsistent with the public interest;" and then if the President——

Mr. COCKRELL. No; I do not think it would.

Mr. MITCHELL. If he then replies that there are certain papers, there could be a further communication from the Executive.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not think it is discourteous at all to pass a resolution calling for such information as we have a right to have. If it were anything that was not completed, if it was not a finished matter, if it was not something that we have to ratify or reject, I would say put that clause in, as a matter of course. But there is no necessity for the language to be inserted here. It is tweedledum and tweedledee so far as the practical effect of it is concerned. Why are Senators stickling so over this matter? Whatever the facts are, we should have them, simply because it is a constitutional right the Senate enjoys and it ought to assert it. It is no disrespect to the President when we do assert it and pass something that is clearly within our constitutional power, without any intention to reflect, directly or indirectly or remotely, in any shape, manner, or form upon the President of the United States.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. If this is a mere matter of tweedledum and tweedledee, I can not understand why such strenuous objection should be made to putting in the resolution the phraseology we usually do.

Mr. COCKRELL. This is our resolution, and you are trying to force this amendment upon us.

Mr. SPOONER. Your resolution!

Mr. COCKRELL. And this is your amendment. If the resolution goes through it will be a resolution of the Senate.

Mr. SPOONER. I supposed it was a Senate resolution; that it was no more yours than ours.

Mr. COCKRELL. You say "yours" and "ours." This is not a political question.

Mr. SPOONER. No.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is no politics in it in any shape, manner, or form; but we of the minority have been recognized as offering the resolution, and although we have the right, the constitutional right, and when we have told you that it is no reflection on anybody, that it is in pursuance of that constitutional right, yet you try to force an amendment here, for which I see no occasion in the world.

Mr. MCLAURIN. Mr. President, I shall endeavor to put the ideas I have in reference to this resolution in as few words as possible, in order to make myself intelligible to the Senate. I must submit at the outset, however, that I am not familiar with precedents which have been discussed by Senators during the consideration of this resolution. I have gotten more information as to those precedents from this discussion than I have from any reading of the precedents themselves.

I will say further that I do not think it proper for a Senator, in discussing any resolution in open Senate, to give expression as to how he is going to vote on the treaty when it comes to its final action in the Senate. That is a matter for executive session, and as much one of the secrets of executive session as anything else.

Before proceeding to a discussion of what I consider the real question contained in this resolution, I want to make an observation in reference to what was said yesterday by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], that this resolution was submitted apparently for the purpose of obtaining some party advantage. It was not introduced for that purpose. I am free to confess that, so far as I am concerned, I am glad when any transaction in the Senate, or in the other House of Congress, or in the executive department redounds to the benefit of the party to which I belong—the Democratic party—but I subordinate all considerations of party interest to my official duty to the entire country.

I can not conceive how there can be anything obtained of advantage to the Democratic party by this resolution, unless there is something behind, as the Senator says has been intimated—I do not think it has been intimated—unless there is something behind that the executive department is not willing for the Senate to know. Assuming, as I do, that there is nothing of that kind in any secret corner, I assert that the best service that can be rendered to the executive department is to give the President the opportunity to make public everything that has been done in reference to the establishment of the Panama Republic if there has not been anything improper done between the officers of this Government and the alleged officers of the so-called Panama Republic, and I assume that there has not been any improper thing done by any officer of our Government.

If the effort were on the part of the Democratic caucus to obtain advantage, the best way to thwart that effort, if there is nothing wrong in the conduct of the Administration in this matter, which I assume to be true, is to make everything public, without reference to the judgment of anybody, and that would be the best answer to any suggestion by anybody or any imputation upon the conduct of any officer of the Administration in connection with either the Panama or the Colombian Government or the Panama or Colombian authorities.

I want to make some observations in reference to the statement that was made yesterday by the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] that this resolution was a command to the President. It is not a command, but is cast in most respectful language, and in order to show that I will read the resolution entire:

Resolved, That the President be requested to inform the Senate whether all the correspondence and notes between the Department of State and the legation of the United States at Bogota, and between either of these and the Government of Colombia for the construction of an isthmian canal since June 28, 1902, and all the correspondence and notes between the United States and any of its officials or representatives or the Government of Panama, concerning the separation of Panama from Colombia, have been sent to the Senate; and if not, that he be requested to send the remaining correspondence and notes to the Senate in executive session.

So there is no suggestion of a command, but a request. If our position is correct, we request the President to grant to the Senate not a concession, but that to which the Senate is entitled. There can be no suggestion of discourtesy in the Senate's passing its judgment upon whether it wants that to which it is entitled or not; whether it ought to be sent or not, and not leaving it to the President to decide, because he is not asked to make public information that is in possession of the executive department of the Government, not asked to make any document or anything that has transpired between the executive department and any of its officers either in Colombia or Panama public, but to send it to the Senate in confidence, because when it is sent to the Senate in executive session it means to send it in confidence.

I resent the imputation of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations should have possession of any information from the executive department to which every Senator in this body is not equally entitled. It is the Senate and every member of it that is entitled to the information that is contained in the archives of the executive department. Every Senator is as much entitled to the information—in confidence, to be sure—as is the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations or any other Senator. The chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, when it comes to advising and consenting to the ratification of a treaty or the making of a treaty, has no more power and no more authority in this body than any other Senator.

The suggestion was made yesterday—I have not read the RECORD this morning—by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] that probably there are some things transpiring now that we should not have, as they would throw no light on the situation. If they would not, no harm would be done, because nobody would know of it except Senators. But it is a familiar principle of law that circumstances and transactions transpiring after may shed light upon the real matter in question, as much so as antecedent and contemporaneous transactions and circumstances.

The desire of the Senate is, or ought to be—it surely is the desire of the Senator who introduced this resolution and a number of others of us—that we should have all the documents and information in reference to this matter that were before the President and which may have operated upon his mind in the negotiation of this treaty.

The question is not, as was stated by the Senator from Wisconsin, whether the President would be justifiable in denying to the Senate, or at least in denying to make public, transactions of the secret service of the executive department of the Government, or whether the President would be justifiable in denying to the Senate, and denying to the public, his plan of military campaign in case of war. That is not the question. It may be granted that in case of anything of that kind the President would judge whether it would operate against the interests of the public service for him to make the matter public; but the question here is whether or not in this case the Senate of the United States is entitled, in passing upon the question as to whether it will advise and consent to the treaty which has been made, to the information which the President had and which operated upon his mind. If the Senate is entitled to this information—in confidence, as the resolution requests—although the Senate has no power to enforce its request, as has been suggested, it ought to make the request predicated on its own judgment. It is impossible, if the Senate keeps faith by holding the communication in confidence, for any harm to thereby come to the public interest. To put the amendment, therefore, is not only idle, but implies that the Senate may divulge that it receives in confidence. It can not be claimed with reason that it would operate against the public good to send any information to the Senate in confidence, and that is what this resolution requests.

I say the simple question is whether the Senate is entitled, in confidence, to all the information the President had, and which may have operated upon his mind, so that the Senate can determine whether it was wise for him to negotiate the treaty and whether, therefore, the Senate will consent to it.

There is no question of the exposure of the secrets of the secret service of the executive department. Nobody proposes to do that. The question is whether the Senate is entitled to this information in confidence. If this body is entitled to this information, and this body, which is to pass upon the treaty, says it wants it, it is no discourtesy to the President to request him to send in here that which we are entitled to have in passing judgment upon the treaty. That is the question, and the entire question. As I have said, it is dissociated from any proposition to expose to the public the secret service; it is dissociated from the proposition to expose to the public a plan of military campaign of the President of the United States.

The President has the power to make treaties by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Whenever the Constitution confers upon the President of the United States any power, it carries with it a duty of that officer. When it devolves upon the Senate of the United States a duty it implies the means and power to intelligently discharge that duty. It is the duty of the President of the United States, as much as it is in his power, to make treaties by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States. It was understood by the framers of the Constitution that it would be in the interest of the Government of the United States that treaties should be made with foreign governments, and it conferred that power upon the President, and that power infers the duty of the President to make treaties.

While that is so, it limited the power, and therefore limited the duty, to the advice and consent of the Senate. When it did that, it made it his duty, this confidential relation existing between him and the Senate, in making a treaty, to confide all the information that he has which this body desires. But it is not to be supposed that this body would desire any information that was not pertinent to the matter in hand. It was, then, the duty of the President to furnish his advisers, who are to advise and consent to a treaty he has negotiated, all the information he had, in order that the Senate may judge of the wisdom or fallacy of the treaty presented, having, therefore, all the opportunity he had for judging of the treaty. Where the propriety of the treaty is to be the joint judgment of two persons of identical interests it seems to me to be the acme of sophistry to argue that one of them is entitled to information denied to the other. If the Senate is entitled to this information and desires it, as is admitted, it seems to me to be a lowering of its dignity to defer its judgment, as to whether it ought to have it, to anybody, even the President.

The Senate is compelled to pass its judgment upon this treaty, and can not delegate that authority to any other power or any other authority. The Senate may make a treaty, dependent upon a subsequent contingency; but the Senate itself must judge of the wisdom or the fallacy of that subsequent contingency. It can not make that contingency depend upon the judgment of any other body, whether the House of Representatives, the Supreme Court of the United States, the President of the United States, or anybody else. It must itself judge of the wisdom or the impropriety of the treaty. The wisdom or impropriety of a treaty upon the happening of a future contingency must be left to the judgment of the Senate. How can the Senate judge of the wisdom of it when the President has asked for its advice—not only the consent, but the advice, of the Senate—when the President refuses to confide in this body, whose advice and consent he asks, the information that is in his possession which this body desires for deliberation on the treaty?

I am not going to discuss the treaty. I am not going further than to say that the very first article of this treaty is a declaration of war against Colombia, if Colombia sees proper or feels able to assert its authority, even in the face of the United States. That being so, this Senate may want information which will enable it to judge whether anything has been done in the establishment of this embryo Republic that would justify us in taking that responsibility upon the Government of the United States or denying that responsibility of the Government of the United States.

We have a right to know everything that the President knows about this treaty. Our authority and our power are coordinate with his authority and his power, coupled with the condition that the Senate advises him to exercise that power and consents to his exercise of that power.

It is said here in advocacy of the position that has been taken by the Administration that Colombia has been a despotic Government over the people of Panama. Mr. President, it does not lie in our mouth to say anything of that kind. We are the last people who ought to assert anything of the despotism of the Colombian Government over Panama in judging of this treaty. That seems to be the argument—that is the argument, I believe—of the Assistant Secretary of State. We are shut off from that because last year we offered a treaty to the Colombian Government whereby we undertook to maintain their authority and their sovereignty over Panama. This Administration undertook to guarantee, less than a year ago, so far as its property was concerned and so far as this territory about which we were treating was concerned, the sovereignty of Colombia and make stronger its hold—its perpetual hold—upon that territory. That was the Hay-Herran treaty. So, as I have said, it does not lie in our mouth to say anything against Colombia for any oppression of Panama.

I am not arguing and I am not going to argue that Panama has not grounds for complaint. I do not know. It is not pertinent or germane to this discussion. If the people of Panama have cause for complaint, it does not lie in the mouth of this Administration to say anything to justify itself because of any tyranny on the part of the Colombian Government over Panama.

It seems that the Administration was willing less than a year ago to fasten the hold of Colombia upon those people if we could only get Colombia to treat with us for control over the Panama Canal and the Panama Canal property. But there is a little intimation contained in the President's message of January 4, on pages 23 and 24, that the time when this Administration wanted to call a halt was when the New Panama Canal Company, not composed of citizens of the United States, but a company in which the Government of the United States is not interested, was about to lose its alleged rights in Colombia by lapse of the statute of limitations, and not when the people of Panama were oppressed by the tyranny of Colombia.

If it is not true that this Administration intended to make this effort for the protection of the New Panama Canal Company, in which the citizens of this Government are not interested, what is the suggestion in the message for? Why is it there? What is its significance? Why should we risk a war for the protection of real or supposed rights of citizens of France or any other country?

One word in reference to international eminent domain, a term that has been suggested in the discussion of this resolution. If there is such a thing in international law, it ought to apply to all governments alike, great and small, because there ought not to be one law to be applied to the weak and another to the strong government; and if this Government has a right to assert the doctrine of international eminent domain, then it would be similar to the doctrine of national eminent domain; and if so, it would be the duty of this Government, in asserting that right, to pay to the real owner of the soil an amount that the property taken was reasonably worth.

That is about all I intended to say, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HANSBROUGH in the chair). The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM].

Mr. CULLOM. I hope we shall have a vote, Mr. President.

Mr. GORMAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, I desire to know whether the vote is to be taken on the resolution or on the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CULBERSON (when Mr. BAILEY'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. BAILEY] is unavoidably absent. If he were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. ELKINS (when his name was called). I inquire if the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that the Senator from Texas is absent.

Mr. ELKINS. I am paired with that Senator, but I transfer that pair to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. HANSBROUGH (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL]. I presume he would vote "nay," if present. I should vote "yea." In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. MCLAURIN (when Mr. MONEY'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. MONEY] is detained from the Senate by reason of sickness. I believe he has a pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY], who is detained from the Chamber by illness. If he were present, he would vote "nay" and I would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. CLARK]. The junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY] has a general pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HANNA]. I therefore transfer my pair with the Senator from Montana to the Senator from Ohio, which will enable the Senator from Kentucky and myself to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. MCCREARY. I vote "nay."

Mr. WARREN. It has been suggested that I transfer my pair with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] to the Senator from Washington [Mr. ANKENY], so that I may vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. CLAY (after having voted in the negative.) I desire to ask if the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that the Senator from Massachusetts has not voted.

Mr. CLAY. I have a general pair with that Senator, and therefore withdraw my vote. If he were present, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. LATIMER (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS]. I do not see him in the Chamber and do not know how he would vote, but I presume he would vote "yea." As I have voted, I desire to withdraw my vote.

Mr. PETTUS. I desire to inquire if the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] is recorded as voting?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. PETTUS. I thought I heard his name read as having voted.

Mr. SPOONER (after having voted in the affirmative). I inadvertently voted without looking to see if the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK], with whom I have a general pair, was present.

Mr. GORMAN (after having voted in the negative). I suggest to the Senator that he and I transfer our pairs. I also voted inadvertently. I have a general pair with the President pro tempore, the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]. I suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin that we transfer our pairs and let our votes stand.

Mr. SPOONER. Very well.

Mr. CLAY. I will transfer my pair to the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BATE], so that the senior Senator from Tennessee will stand paired with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 39, nays 20, as follows:

YEAS—39.

Aldrich,	Cullom,	Gallinger,	Perkins,
Alger,	Depew,	Gamble,	Platt, Conn.
Allison,	Dillingham,	Heyburn,	Proctor,
Ball,	Dolliver,	Hoar,	Quarles,
Bard,	Dryden,	Kean,	Scott,
Beveridge,	Elkins,	Kittredge,	Smoot,
Burnham,	Fairbanks,	Long,	Spooner,
Burrows,	Foraker,	McComas,	Stewart,
Clapp,	Foster, Wash.	McEnery,	Warren
Clark, Wyo.	Fulton,	Nelson,

NAYS—20.

Bacon,	Culberson,	Mallory,	Pettus,
Berry,	Gibson,	Martin,	Simmons,
Blackburn,	Gorman,	Newlands,	Stone,
Clay,	McCreary,	Overman,	Taliaferro,
Cockrell,	McLaurin,	Patterson,	Tillman.

NOT VOTING—31.

Allee,	Daniel,	Hawley,	Money,
Ankeny,	Dietrich,	Hopkins,	Morgan,
Bailey,	Dubois,	Kearns,	Penrose,
Bate,	Foster, La.	Latimer,	Platt, N. Y.
Burton,	Frye,	Lodge,	Quay,
Carmack,	Hale,	McCumber,	Teller,
Clark, Mont.	Hanna,	Millard,	Wetmore.
Clark, Ark.	Hansbrough,	Mitchell,

So the amendment of Mr. CULLOM was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to suggest to the Senator on the other side having charge of this resolution that its phraseology is not exactly what we should have in an important state paper going from the Senate. There are two clauses in it. The first clause asks for the correspondence and notes "for the construction of an isthmian canal." I suppose the mover of the resolution would prefer to have it "relating to" instead of "for."

Mr. CULBERSON. There is no objection to that modification.

Mr. HOAR. The other clause is "all the correspondence and notes between the United States and any of its officials." The United States does not correspond with its officials in any proper sense of that phrase. It should be "the Department of State and any official or representative." The United States does not in its own name correspond with any of its servants. One servant corresponds with another. I would suggest instead of "between the United States," the words "between the Department of State and any of the officials or representatives of the United States."

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly. I have finished what I had to say.

Mr. CULBERSON. While I think the criticism of the distinguished Senator—and I say it with due deference—is hypercritical, there is no objection to any alteration which may make the resolution clearer to others than it seems to be. If it is satisfactory, it may read:

And notes between the Government——

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me to suggest what has just been suggested to me? The resolution itself in the first clause uses the phrase which I think is the preferable one, that is, "between the Department of State." If that can be used in the second clause it would remove the criticism.

Mr. CULBERSON. The last paragraph of the resolution is intended to be broader than the first. We want any communication of an official character between any Department of the Government in the last instance and any of its officials or representatives or with the Government of Panama. We have no objection to adding before the words "United States" the words "the Government of." In order to meet the suggestion——

Mr. HOAR. Suppose the Senator should say "and all the correspondence and notes between any Department of the Government."

Mr. CULBERSON. I was about to suggest, after the word "between," in line 7, the insertion of the words "any Department of."

Mr. SPOONER. That is all right.

Mr. ALLISON. "The Government of the United States."

Mr. CULBERSON. Let the Secretary read the resolution, or that part of it as proposed to be amended.

The SECRETARY. In line 6, after the word "between," it is proposed to insert "any Department of the Government of."

Mr. HOAR. That makes it clear.

Mr. CULLOM. Let it be read as the resolution will now read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the resolution as it is proposed to be amended.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested to inform the Senate whether all the correspondence and notes between the Department of State and the legation of the United States at Bogota, and between either of these and the Government of Colombia for the construction of an isthmian canal——

Mr. HOAR. That was amended by consent, substituting the words "in relation to" instead of "for."

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the resolution, as follows:

and the Government of Colombia in relation to the construction of an isthmian canal, since June 28, 1902, and all the correspondence and notes between any Department of the Government of the United States and any of its officials or representatives or the Government of Panama, concerning the separation of Panama from Colombia, have been sent to the Senate, and, if not, that he be requested to send the remaining correspondence and notes to the Senate in executive session, if not, in his judgment, incompatible with the public interest.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President, I will thank you to state what the proposition is. I have just entered the Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution offered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON].

Mr. STONE. As amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Which has been amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

WILLIAM D. CRUM.

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, instructed to send to the Senate information in regard to the appointment of William D. Crum as collector of the port of Charleston, S. C., and that he answer specifically the following questions:

First. Is William D. Crum now holding a commission as collector? If so, give date, and send to the Senate a verbatim copy thereof.

Second. Was his second appointment made in accordance with law; and if so, what law?

Third. Is there any law or precedent for the holding of an office of this kind by a "de facto" official?

Fourth. Is it the contention or intention to claim and exercise the authority to make such appointments during a constructive recess, as this appears to be?

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Rhode Island give me one minute in which to explain the resolution?

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, yesterday we received from the Secretary of the Treasury an answer to a resolution passed on the 25th of January, endeavoring to get this same information. I will read that letter, as it is very remarkable:

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY, TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 27, 1904.

MY DEAR SIR: Replying to Senate's resolution of January 25, 1904, I beg to advise, William D. Crum was appointed collector at the port of of Charleston, S. C., March 20, 1903, and a temporary commission issued. Mr. Crum qualified by executing bond for $50,000 and took oath of office March 30, 1903. Mr. Crum was again appointed December 7, 1903, and has given bond in the sum of $50,000 and took the oath of office on January 9, 1904. There has been no third appointment and no fourth appointment. The same information is contained in a letter to Hon. B. R. TILLMAN, under date of January 8, 1904, and which appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 25, 1904.

The resolution also asks: "Is Mr. Crum now in office; and if so, under what authority of law?" William D. Crum is de facto collector at the port of Charleston, S. C. Whether he holds his position under authority of law is determinable not by the executive department of the Government, but by the judiciary, and by that only. He is not receiving pay, because of the provisions of section 1761.

Very truly, yours,

L. M. SHAW.

Hon. WILLIAM P. FRYE,
President pro tempore United States Senate.

Mr. President, the trouble with this letter is that it is again ambiguous. I ask that the resolution which I have just offered may be read, so that Senators can see just what points are left out or are left in an ambiguous or uncertain and nebulous condition here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will again read the resolution.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

Mr. TILLMAN. Does the Senator from Rhode Island wish any additional discussion?

Mr. ALDRICH. I will ask that the resolution may go over until to-morrow.

Mr. TILLMAN. Oh, Mr. President, it takes us so long to get this information when we start that I hope the Senator will not do that. I will not say another word. The resolution is very clear on its face. It simply endeavors to get the Secretary to tell us what a de facto official is.

Mr. KEAN. Consult the law books.

Mr. TILLMAN. We are not supposed to go to the law books, if the Senator from New Jersey will permit me. We are Senators here in the discharge of certain functions, and I am trying to get the Treasury Department to tell us just where this man is and how he got there.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. TILLMAN. I can not help but yield, because the resolution is not yet before the Senate for consideration, and if he insists upon its going over it will have to go over. But I submit to him that the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury warrants the inquiries which I have presented. It does not appear that we are going to get this information in any other way, and I do not know whether we are going to get it now.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will not object to the first part of the resolution, which simply directs the Secretary to send here the papers in the case. Then we ourselves can judge whether the appointment is in accordance with the law. It is not fair to ask the Secretary of the Treasury a lot of legal questions.

Mr. HALE. Strike out the last two clauses.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Secretary says Crum is a de facto official. I want to know where the Secretary of the Treasury or any other official of this Government gets the authority to say to the Senate, which has a right to confirm or reject a nomination, "This man is in office, and nobody can determine his status but the judiciary."

Mr. ALDRICH. When the Senate is in possession of the information——

Mr. TILLMAN. I am trying to get it, and the Senator from Rhode Island will not allow me.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from South Carolina goes further. He asks for opinions, and not facts.

Mr. TILLMAN. Opinions? I ask what a de facto official is? If the Secretary will not send his own opinion here, I would not ask him for the opinions of others.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think it is better, and that the Senator will reach his purpose more promptly and efficaciously by asking for facts rather than for opinions.

Mr. HALE. Strike out the last two clauses.

Mr. ALDRICH. Strike out the last two clauses of the resolution.

Mr. TILLMAN. Please read the resolution again and let me see what it is proposed to leave out, and let me see if they propose to cut it off right behind the ears.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will again read the resolution.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, instructed to send to the Senate information in regard to the appointment of William D. Crum as collector of the port of Charleston, S. C., and that he answer specifically the following questions:

First. Is William D. Crum now holding a commission as collector? If so, give date and send to the Senate a verbatim copy thereof.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is all right.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the resolution, as follows:

Second. Was his second appointment made in accordance with law; and if so, what law?

Third. Is there any law or precedent for the holding of an office of this kind by a "de facto" official?

Fourth. Is it the contention or intention to claim and exercise the authority to make such appointments during a constructive recess, as this appears to be?

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator from Rhode Island will indulge me for one moment, I will call his attention to the fact that on two previous occasions, once by me through a personal letter, and the other by the Senate in the form of a resolution, we have tried to get this very information, and that the Secretary has, apparently, with great adroitness, dodged it.

Mr. SPOONER. What has he done?

Mr. TILLMAN. He has dodged the inquiry as to whether or not this man is lawfully in office.

Mr. SPOONER. Oh, well——

Mr. TILLMAN. And he says he is a de facto official.

Mr. SPOONER. He has stated the facts. He was asked whether this man was in office, and he informs the Senate that he was commissioned in March. That was in the recess.

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes; which was lawful.

Mr. SPOONER. Which was lawful. He informs the Senate also that he was appointed on December 7.

Mr. TILLMAN. "Appointed," mind you. The usual form is nominated again.

Mr. SPOONER. No; appointed on December 7.

Mr. TILLMAN. That is what he states.

Mr. SPOONER. That is what he says.

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. Commissioned December 7.

Mr. TILLMAN. No; he does not say he has a commission now.

Mr. SPOONER. Oh, well; he was appointed December 7. He is still in office, he says, and has given bond. Now he says he is a de facto officer. That is a question of law; and does not the Senator think that as he is asking the Senate to take the deposition of the Secretary of the Treasury and as he has framed several direct interrogatories, as the lawyers call it, he had better let the resolution go over until to-morrow to see if there be not some cross-interrogatories to be proposed?

Mr. TILLMAN. This is a very important matter. It is very much more important, to my mind, than the matter which we have just disposed of.

Mr. SPOONER. I, too, think it is important.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is too important to be laughed at and slurred over.

Mr. SPOONER. I am not laughing at it. I think the Senator knows on the facts whether or not Crum was lawfully appointed.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have my opinion.

Mr. CULLOM. The difficulty is that it goes further than is necessary, in speaking about a de facto officer.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. TILLMAN. The other inquiry asks under what authority of law the appointment was made, and instead of telling us where he got any authority or where there is a precedent or any statute allowing the President or the Secretary to appoint an official and issue a commission which is subject to the approval of the Senate, he goes forward and says, "Now he is de facto." That is a brand-new phrase in this connection.

Mr. SPOONER. Oh, no.

Mr. TILLMAN. I understand that. There are de facto governments, like the one at Panama, and there are de jure governments, and all that kind of thing, but I am endeavoring to locate the contention of the executive department in this connection. If they contend that there is a constructive recess, which occurred between 12 o'clock and 12 o'clock on the 7th of December, let them say so. I do not want them to go and do the thing and then try to hide out in the bushes.

Mr. SPOONER. The truth is——

Mr. TILLMAN. Another question I will ask my friend is this: He says this is a question for the decision of the judicial department. I want to know who can bring a case in court to test it if we surrender our right and our duty to pass upon the question of appointments?

I want to ask my friend also: Suppose this was in Milwaukee or New York, instead of Charleston?

Mr. SPOONER. It would not change the case at all.

Mr. TILLMAN. It would not change the case at all, except it would not be attempted, and you know it. No President would dare attempt it.

Mr. SPOONER. I am not feeling very well this morning, and I think the Senator ought not to be so threatening.

Mr. TILLMAN. I feel very deeply and strongly, but I do not intend to threaten my friend. I speak emphatically, and if he is so thin-skinned that he objects to Senators displaying earnestness such as he sometimes manifests, I will apologize.

Mr. SPOONER. The truth is, this resolution ought to go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will go over under the rule.

RELATIONS WITH COLOMBIA.

Mr. BACON. I desire to ask permission of the Senate, under the order which has previously been made, to call up Senate resolution 82, in order that I may submit some remarks in reference thereto.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution indicated by the Senator from Georgia.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution No. 82, by Mr. BACON, favoring the negotiation by the President of a treaty with Colombia for the adjustment of all differences between the United States and that country growing out of the recent revolution in Panama.

Mr. BACON. I ask that the resolution may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. BACON on the 12th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be respectfully informed that the Senate favor and advise the negotiation, with a view to its ratification, of a treaty with the Republic of Colombia, to the end that there may be peacefully and satisfactorily determined and adjusted all differences between the United States and the Republic of Colombia growing out of the recent revolution in Panama and the consequent secession of Panama from Colombia, and the alleged aid and assistance by the land and naval power of the United States in the successful accomplishment of said revolution and secession, through the alleged forcible prevention by said land or naval forces of the assertion and maintenance by Colombia of her sovereignty and authority in Panama; and that full and complete compensation may be made by the United States to the Republic of Colombia for the loss of her sovereignty and property rights in Panama, so far as the same may be shown to be due to any act of the United States through the land or naval forces of the same.

Resolved further, That the President be respectfully informed that if it should prove to be impracticable for the United States and the Republic of Colombia to agree through a convention upon the question of the said alleged responsibility on the part of the United States, or upon the question of the amount of compensation to be made when such responsibility shall be established, the Senate in that case favor and advise the negotiation, with a view to its ratification, of a treaty with the Republic of Colombia submitting to the Permanent Court of Arbitration at The Hague or to some other tribunal to be agreed upon, for impartial arbitrament and peaceful determination, all questions between the United States and the Republic of Colombia growing out of the matters herein recited.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, most of the resolutions which have been offered on the Panama question, if not all of them, except those which relate to this particular phase of the question, naturally provoke a discussion of the questions relating to the advisability and propriety of the ratification of the Panama treaty. This particular resolution, however, has no such relation to the discussion which is now in progress. It does not in any manner involve the question as to whether the treaty should or should not be ratified. One might be in favor of the ratification of the treaty and at the same time be opposed to the adoption of the pending resolution. On the other hand, he might favor the adoption of the resolution and be opposed to the ratification of the treaty; or he might be opposed both to the treaty and the resolution, or he might favor both the resolution and the treaty. So the consideration of this question need not in any manner enlist either opposition or approval, according as a Senator may or may not be in favor of the ratification of the treaty.

The sole purpose of the resolution is to endeavor to place the Senate and the Government of the United States, through its treaty-making power, in a position which may avert hostilities, violence of any kind which otherwise may ensue, and at the same time put the Government in a position where it may have advantages in the future in its peaceful relations with Colombia which might otherwise be denied to it.

When the resolution was introduced it was most vigorously and vehemently assailed by Senators on the opposite side of the Chamber. It was assailed in terms little short of indignation as being utterly beyond the possibility of approval by the Senate, and of a character so objectionable that it could not even have the consideration which would result from a reference to a committee.

The junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], immediately upon the introduction of the resolution, denounced it in most unsparing terms, and endeavored to deny to it the opportunity even of a reference to a committee by a motion to make immediate disposition of it by laying it on the table, and the general consensus, so far as might be judged by utterances upon that occasion by the Senators on the other side of the Chamber, was in accord with that position taken by the Senator from Massachusetts.

It was not until later in the day, during the debate, that the resolution had the recognition of any kindly word from any Republican Senator, although it is a resolution addressed to the conscience of the Senate and of the Government, and an appeal not for strife, but an appeal for peace and concord. Later in the day, I repeat, there was one kindly word of recognition which came from the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], and the original suggestion of the Senator from Maine was one which I was prepared and disposed to be in accord with, although it did not go, as I stated then, as far as I desired it to do. The original suggestion of the Senator from Maine looked to a negotiation with Colombia direct by the United States Government with a view to an agreement for a settlement of differences between the United States and Colombia, and I was disposed to accept the same, and I even then invited him to frame a resolution upon that line.

Unfortunately, however, upon reflection the Senator from Maine did not go so far in the resolution which he proposed as a substitute as was originally suggested by him, and therefore, when it was introduced, I said to him, in recognition of what had passed the day before, that I must not be considered as accepting the resolution as a substitute, which he recognized as entirely proper.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I did not consider what the Senator said when upon his feet at that time as binding him in any way to accept my amendment. In fact, I afterwards introduced my proposition separately and distinctly from the Senator's and had it referred to the committee. I do not consider the Senator as in the slightest degree bound to accept what I offered.

Mr. BACON. I do not know that the Senator heard what I said previously, which was to the effect that if the resolution had been in accord with the first statement of the Senator in the colloquy which we had I would have been disposed to have accepted it, but the resolution as introduced by the Senator, first as a substitute and afterwards, I understand, as an independent measure, did not go as far as he first suggested at the time when I signified my disposition to assent to the proposition suggested by him.

Now, Mr. President, the attitude of the Senators on the other side of the Chamber with reference to the resolution is, or was at that time, that it was utterly inappropriate and inadmissible, and that it was not even to be considered by the Senate with a view to concurrence therein. The attitude of Senators on the other side of the Chamber was that the proposition to enter into any negotiations with Colombia with a view to a peaceful settlement of our differences with her was monstrous, obnoxious, and not entitled to the decent and respectful consideration of the Senate. The object which I have to-day in addressing the Senate is to call attention to the fact that that resolution is in direct accord with and in direct pursuance of the declared policy of the United States Government, as manifested in actions innumerable in which the Government has committed itself in the most emphatic and solemn manner to the proposition that it is opposed to war; that it is opposed to violence as a remedy for disagreements with other nations; that it will treat with other nations with a view to agreement as to differences, and that if in the pursuance of such negotiations and treaties it is impossible to come to an agreement, rather than resort to violence or to attempt to have settlement by the assertion of might, it will in all cases, speaking generally, of course, endeavor, by reference to a third party, to arbitration of some kind, to avoid a resort to force and violence.

Then I propose, in the second place, to show that this is one of the direct classes of cases which properly fall within those thus recognized as properly to be settled either by treaty negotiation or by arbitration, and that unless there can be shown to be some defect in that statement this Government is bound by its pledges, bound by its repeated utterances of all kinds, by treaties, acts of Congress, resolutions, utterances of our Presidents and our Secretaries of State, bound by the most solemn of obligations, of plighted faith, to recognize it in this instance. Mr. President, I wish to cite the Senate to the record that the United States Government has made on this subject, not beginning at the beginning, but at a point where the action and declared attitude of the United States Government, or rather of the legislative department of the Government, became more pronounced possibly than at any previous time. I call attention to Senate Document No. 141, Fiftieth Congress, first session. In that Congress there appeared before the Foreign Relations Committee a committee appointed and sent by a large public meeting in the city of New York. This committee was composed of eminent men—Mr. David Dudley Field, Mr. Andrew Carnegie, Mr. Morris K. Jesup, Mr. Charles A. Peabody, Mr. Dorman B. Eaton, and Mr. Abram S. Hewitt, of which committee Mr. Field, Mr. Carnegie, and Mr. Peabody appeared in person before the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations.

The memorial presented there by these citizens of New York was one in which there was a specific application for the negotiation and making of a treaty between the United States Government and the Government of Great Britain, the particular occasion for that application and memorial being the result of a large public meeting held in New York to receive an address which had been made by some two hundred and thirty-odd members of the British House of Commons asking that such a negotiation should be had for the purpose of making such a treaty.

That committee appeared, as I said, before the Committee on Foreign Relations and personal addresses were made to the committtee by each of the three gentlemen whom I have mentioned as present, and they presented a written memorial, which is included in this Senate document. They set out the fact, a most remarkable fact, that there had been within recent years, speaking relatively, of course—that is, within the years of the nineteenth century following the general pacification in 1815—about sixty treaties submitting differences to arbitration, and that of those treaties some thirty-odd had been made by the Government of the United States with different governments. That was stated by them to be an incomplete statement of the number of treaties made by the United States Government, and it is true that some were omitted. Counting those that were thus omitted and adding to them such as have been made since that date, it is a fact very much to the credit of the Government of the United States and very much in point in the present consideration that the United States Government has entered since its organization into about fifty different treaties for arbitration of differences with other governments.

Of course it is not necessary to enumerate them. Senators are familiar with them, and there are some thirty-odd of them set out in this document. I wish to read only one of them. At the conclusion of the Mexican war, when we made the treaty of peace with Mexico—I only use this as an illustration, one of many—the following article was included:

ARTICLE XXI.

If unhappily any disagreement should hereafter arise between the Governments of the two Republics, whether with respect to the interpretation of any stipulation in this treaty, or with respect to any other particular concerning the political or commercial relations of the two nations, the said Governments, in the name of those nations, do promise to each other that they will endeavor, in the most sincere and earnest manner, to settle the differences so arising, and to preserve the state of peace and friendship in which the two countries are now placing themselves, using, for this end, mutual representations and pacific negotiations. And if, by these means, they should not be enabled to come to an agreement, a resort shall not, on this account, be had to reprisals, aggression, or hostility of any kind, by the one Republic against the other, until the Government of that which deems itself aggrieved shall have maturely considered, in the spirit of peace and good neighborship, whether it would not be better that such difference should be settled by the arbitration of commissioners appointed on each side, or by that of a friendly nation. And should such course be proposed by either party, it shall be acceded to by the other, unless deemed by it altogether incompatible with the nature of the difference, or the circumstances of the case.

I only read that as a sample, as one of many, as I said, nearly fifty of them, forty-nine possibly may be the accurate number of treaties which have been made by the United States Government, each of them recognizing the principle of agreeing with a country, if possible, when there is a difference existing between the two, and, in case of an impossibility of agreement, for a reference of that matter to the arbitration and settlement of some friendly and neutral power or tribunal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia will please suspend one moment while the Chair lays before the Senate the Calendar of General Orders.

The SECRETARY. Order of Business, Senate bill 887.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask unanimous consent that that be laid aside for the balance of the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the Senator from Georgia be allowed to proceed. The Chair hears no objection, and the Senator will proceed.

Mr. BACON. The memorial thus presented, to which I have alluded and which represented a large meeting in the State of New York, concludes in this language:

We beg, therefore, most respectfully to ask from Congress the passage of a joint resolution requesting the President to propose to the Government of Great Britain the making of a treaty between the two nations, for a limited period at least, providing in substance that in case a difference should arise between them respecting the interpretation of any treaty which they have made or may hereafter make with each other, or any claim of either under the established law of nations, or respecting the boundary of any of their respective possessions, or respecting any wrong alleged to have been committed by either nation upon the other or its members, or any duty omitted, it shall be the earnest endeavor of both the contracting parties to accommodate the difference by conciliatory negotiation; and that in no event shall either nation begin a war against the other without first offering to submit the difference between them to arbitrators, chosen as may be then agreed, or if there be no different agreement, then by three arbitrators, one to be chosen by each party and an umpire by those so chosen; it being understood, however, that arbitration as thus provided for shall not extend to any question respecting the independence or sovereignty of either nation, its equality with other nations, its form of government, its internal affairs, or its continental policy.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator be kind enough to read again the number of that document?

Mr. BACON. Yes, sir. Its number is 141, miscellaneous document of the Senate, Fiftieth Congress, first session.

The presentation of that memorial under the very impressing circumstances which gave rise to it had such influence upon the Senate, and at about the same time there were so many other memorials upon the subject of the peaceful settlement of international disputes, and so many bills and resolutions introduced into the Senate, that the following order was passed by the Senate:

Resolved, That the several memorials, statements, interviews, bills, and resolutions on international arbitration, presented to the Senate or to the Committee on Foreign Relations during the present session, be printed for the use of the Senate.

And in response to that order this document which I hold in my hand was compiled and printed.

The presentation by that committee was a very small part of the general public movement which was made at that time to commit this Government by direct action to the principles sought to be established, to wit, conciliatory and peaceful agreement, if possible; arbitration, if such agreement should be found to be impracticable. I want to call the attention of the Senate to some of the numerous memorials addressed at that time to the Senate of the United States, and to various proceedings of the Senate in pursuance of that general wish, which are to be found in this document. They are from people all over the United States, regardless of section. The first one to which I call the attention of the Senate is a petition from citizens of California. The presentation to the Senate of the memorial was January 10, 1888, at least that is the date of the memorial, and it was within a few days after that that the committee appeared before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. May I ask the Senator what memorial he refers to? I did not hear his earlier statement.

Mr. BACON. I refer to the memorial which was presented to the Senate through the Foreign Relations Committee by a committee of eminent citizens of New York, appointed by a large mass meeting in the city of New York, the immediate convocation of which was due to an address which had been presented by two hundred and thirty-odd members of the British House of Commons urging upon the citizens of the United States that steps should be taken by which a treaty should be had between Great Britain and the United States which should provide for conciliatory negotiations in case of any differences, and in the absence of any practical agreement to provide in such a case for a court of arbitration. I will not go further in the repetition of what I had stated before the Senator was in his seat in the Senate. I presume that will be sufficient to connect what I am now saying with what I had previously said.

I called the attention of the Senate to the fact that that proceeding had enlisted the attention of the Senate to such an extent that it ordered that there should be compiled and printed for the use of the Senate the memorials and addresses from different parts of the country which were during that session of Congress presented in advocacy of this general idea and desire for conciliatory agreement and for practical arbitration in the absence of a satisfactory result in an attempt for conciliatory negotiation. I was about to read, at the time the honorable Senator from Indiana interrupted me, the short petition, as it is here designated, from the citizens of California, signed by a great many of them:

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

The undersigned, citizens of the United States and of the State of California, profoundly impressed with the evils of war, and rejoicing that our own country is at peace, and not, like so many other nations, staggering under immense armaments as costly as war itself, would earnestly pray your honorable body either to enact as a law one of the ten bills intended to promote international arbitration, already introduced and referred to appropriate committees of Congress, or to provide in some way for a convention of American and other nations, the object of which shall be to discuss and agree upon a permanent high court of arbitration in which the civilized world may be represented, and to which may be referred those disputes that have usually led to war.

Till such a permanent court is established, we would urge the insertion of a clause in every treaty providing that differences arising under it should be referred to disinterested arbitrators.

I do not read all of these memorials and petitions; but I skip to different sections of the Union in order that it may be seen there was this general and widespread desire on the part of our people that the Government of the United States should, in its most authoritative and solemn utterances, provide measures which would make the possibility of war least and provide the machinery by which the possibility of war might be avoided.

I read one now from New Hampshire, and I do not think that I will unduly occupy the time of the Senate if I put upon record in consecutive form that which shall indicate the high and honorable and solemn purpose of the people of the United States under all circumstances and on all occasions to put itself in the attitude of a peacemaker and a peace observer, a deprecator of war, and one ready to submit differences to a tribunal of arbitration rather than stand out with the attitude of one who asserts he is right and can not be wrong and will not admit the adjudication of that question by anyone.

I will not read all of the memorial from the citizens of New Hampshire, because I want to read several from other States, and I would unduly burden the RECORD if I read each in full; but in speaking about the desirability that there should be this arrangement made between the United States Government and the Government of Great Britain the citizens of New Hampshire, large numbers of whom signed the paper, go on to express the view which indicates that their desire was not one simply for peace between this Government and the Government of Great Britain, but that it was a desire that the United States Government should occupy the position of desiring peace with all peoples. It concludes in this language, speaking of the desirability of the proposed treaty between Great Britain and the United States:

That it would induce other governments to join in efforts to supplant by the methods of reason the unjust, rude, and cruel ways of war, of which the masses of mankind are weary, and that the definite inauguration of a policy thus aiming at perpetual peace and universal law would constitute one of the greatest services and greatest glories of the American Republic.

Next I read one from the State of Ohio. This, also referring to the immediate proposition for a treaty between Great Britain and the United States, concludes:

Respectfully pray that you will take such proceedings as may be necessary to propose such a treaty, believing as we do that the United States of America are peculiarly fitted to take such a step in the interest of humanity and universal peace and good will among men.

Not simply peace between the United States and Great Britain, but in the interest of humanity and universal peace and good will among men.

Now, the memorial from the State of Maine uses similar language, signed by a large number, filling half a page on this printed document, of the citizens of Maine, referring particularly to the proposed British treaty, and then recognizing that that is not the sole idea, but that the idea is that the United States Government shall take a position which shall plant it upon the side of those who favor peace, not only with Great Britain, not only with the strong, but with the weak and with all peoples.

That it would induce other governments to join in efforts to supplant by the methods of reason the unjust, rude, and cruel ways of war, of which the masses of mankind are weary, and that the definite inauguration of a policy thus aiming at perpetual peace and universal law would constitute one of the greatest services and greatest glories of the American Republic.

Before I finish I desire to show not only that the people of Maine were imbued by such a desire, but that some of the most eminent men from Maine, who have illustrated their State and the citizenry of this country, have in the most pronounced manner committed this Government, so far as they were able to do it by their voice and by their influence, to this most benign and beneficent policy.

Mr. President, I have here a large petition, printed in this document, from the State of Massachusetts. I shall not stop to read it. I am sorry that the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who was so exceedingly indignant at the bare idea that the Government of the United States, the great, strong Government of the United States, should for a moment contemplate a submission to arbitration or contemplate the attempt at conciliatory negotiation with the weak, feeble power of Colombia, is not now present, in order that he might hear me read the resolutions of the legislature of Massachusetts upon that subject, also found in this same document.

Mr. MCCREARY. Will the Senator be kind enough to tell the date of those resolutions?

Mr. BACON. I have already stated it; it is in 1888, during the first session of the Fiftieth Congress, when the Senate of the United States by order had this document compiled, showing the memorials which had been presented to that session of Congress. I have read a number of them, but I presume the Senator was not in his seat at the time.

This is a resolution by the legislature of Massachusetts, signed by all of its officers, both of the senate and the house:

Resolved, That the senate and house of representatives in general court assembled approve of the efforts being made relating to the ultimate ratification of treaties which shall provide for the settlement by arbitration of any difference or disputes arising between the Governments of Great Britain or other civilized nations and the United States which can not be adjusted by diplomatic agency, and thereby providing for the settlement of all international difficulties which may arise without resorting to cruel methods of war and bloodshed.

Mr. President, in the same document there is printed a resolution which was reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations as the result of all those memorials and of this particular hearing before the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate of this New York committee. It is a resolution which Mr. Sherman, the chairman of the committee, reported as the action of the Foreign Relations Committee in consequence of the appeals which had been made to it and to the Senate:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
June 13, 1888.

Mr. Sherman, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported the following concurrent resolution to invite international arbitration as to differences between nations—

Not simply betweeen this nation and Great Britain—

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President be, and is hereby, requested to invite, from time to time, as fit occasions may arise, negotiations with any government with which the United States has or may have diplomatic relations, to the end that any differences or disputes arising between the two governments which can not be adjusted by diplomatic agency may be referred to arbitration, and be peaceably adjusted by such means.

Before I get through I intend to briefly discuss whether or not this particular proposed negotiation will fall within the terms of that resolution thus reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations, but I pretermit that for the present.

It also sets out two bills which were introduced in that session, each of them by a Senator from the State of Iowa. Under date of December 12, 1887, all in the same session of Congress, Mr. Wilson, of Iowa, introduced this bill:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
December 12, 1887.

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and hereby is, authorized and requested to institute negotiations with other governments for the creation of a tribunal for international arbitration, or other appropriate means whereby all difficulties and disputes between nations may be peaceably settled and wars prevented.

SEC. 2. That the President be, and hereby is, authorized to invite the several governments of North, Central, and South America, and such other governments as he in his discretion may determine, to send delegates to an international convention to be held in Washington, at such time as he may designate, for the purpose of considering and agreeing upon measures for the promotion of peace and amity among nations.

A proposition which afterwards materialized, to which I shall call more specifically the attention of the Senate.

The other Senator from Iowa, the present senior Senator [Mr. ALLISON], introduced a bill, which I shall now read. I should like very much if Senators would note, in view of our recent discussions here, the language which the Senator from Iowa used in the bill which he introduced. He goes further than his colleague, who simply requested the President. His bill reads:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to institute negotiations with the Governments of Great Britain and France for the purpose of creating a permanent tribunal for international arbitration, whereby all difficulties, differences, and disputes between the United States and these nations may be promptly, peaceably, and amicably settled.

But, Mr. President, while all of these to which I have called attention were in that particular session of Congress—and I have not called attention to all of them, by any means, but only selected some of the most prominent—that was not the origin of the pacific policy of the Government of the United States and of the people of the United States.

It is a remarkable fact that before the present Government of the United States was ever formed, in a treaty made by the old Confederation with one of the Barbary States—I have forgotten which one it was, but it was made in 1787—even with that distant and semicivilized people, there was inserted a clause which provided for peaceful negotiations between us and them in regard to any disputes that might thereafter arise in order that thereby war might be averted. But it is true that the most pronounced and decided attitude of the United States Government upon that subject was not assumed until after the period known as the period of the great pacification in 1815, at the end of the Napoleonic wars and of the war between this country and Great Britain.

But beginning, if I recollect correctly, with the year 1816 up to the year 1902 there has been an almost unbroken series not simply of utterances in Congress, not simply of resolutions introduced or of acts passed looking to such settlement, but of actual treaty negotiations entered into between the Government of the United States and almost all other governments, either making some general provision for arbitration whenever the necessity for it might arise or providing for some particular arbitration to settle some particular dispute. I desire, Mr. President, to express what must be a cause of pride to every American when I state that within that term more than half of all the arbitration treaties which have been entered into by all the nations of all the world have been entered into by the Government of the United States with other nations for the purpose of avoiding war and for the purpose of settling disputes by friendly negotiation, if possible, and then, if not possible, by submission to the determination of some impartial tribunal.

I am going, sir, simply to touch along at different points and not endeavor to present the whole record to the Senate, because I think I am within the bounds of moderation when I say that if the archives of this Government could be searched, if all the records that are beneath the Dome of this Capitol could be produced, there would be found absolutely tons and wagon loads of memorials which have come to Congress from the people of the United States, all praying for the accomplishment of this great, benign, and beneficent purpose and end.

If there is one thing that is more absolutely settled as the purpose and desire of the people of the United States than another, it is that; and, sir, it is not limited to that honorable sect which is opposed to war under any and all circumstances, but it pervades all classes of our people who thus generally deprecate war, bloodshed, and violence, and who desire that there should be an appeal to reason and a settlement, if you please, by concession rather than a determination by brute force.

As I have said, I am simply going to skip along and note at different times what have been the utterances of this Government, either by acts or resolutions or by the expressions of the committees of either House of Congress and otherwise. Away back in 1851 the resolution which I shall now read was reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, and will be found in Senate Report No. 270, Thirty-first Congress, second session. I will read the resolution. There is nothing new in it, but I will read it just to show what has been the uniform manifestation and utterance by the Senate of the United States.

Whereas appeals to the sword for the determination of national controversies are always productive of immense evils; and whereas the spirit and enterprises of the age, but more especially the genius of our own Government, the habits of our people, and the highest permanent prosperity of our Republic, as well as the claims of humanity, the dictates of enlightened reason, and the precepts of our holy religion, all require the adoption of every feasible measure consistent with the national honor and the security of our rights, to prevent as far as possible the recurrence of war hereafter: Therefore,

Resolved, That in the judgment of this body it would be proper and desirable for the Government of these United States, wherever practicable, to secure in its treaties with other nations a provision for referring to the decision of umpires all future misunderstandings that can not be satisfactorily adjusted by amicable negotiation in the first instance before a resort to hostilities shall be had.

In 1853, in the very next Congress, the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations makes a most elaborate report of many pages in advocacy of the same idea. This was in response to peace memorials which had been referred by the Senate to that committee. Without stopping to read the report, which is quite lengthy, after reciting the evils of war and alluding to the various difficulties which are encountered in the effort to provide for peaceful arbitration, the committee say:

All that the committee are willing to advise and recommend for the present is that in the treaties which are hereafter made with foreign nations it shall be stipulated between the contracting parties that all differences which may arise shall be referred to arbitrators for adjustment.

And in the same report—I will read now what I may have occasion to use subsequently in some things which I may have to submit to the Senate, replying to the contention we now have that the United States can not submit to arbitration any question involving a question of our honor—the committee say:

It sometimes happens that "the point of honor" between nations seems to demand immediate action and a blow is given without time for deliberation. The nation struck resents, and war is the consequence. Treaty stipulations requiring arbitration would be a salutary remedy in such cases. The "point of honor" would then consist in adhering to the treaty.

In 1872 Mr. Sumner, then a Senator from the State of Massachusetts, introduced a series of resolutions with preambles setting out the evils of war, etc. I will read two of the resolutions. I read from the Journal of the Senate, May 31, 1872:

Resolved, That any withdrawal from a treaty recognizing arbitration or any refusal to abide the judgment of the accepted tribunal or any interposition of technicalities to limit the proceedings is to this extent a disparagement of the tribunal as a substitute for war and therefore hostile to civilization.

Resolved, That the United States, having at heart the cause of peace everywhere, and hoping to help its permanent establishment between nations, hereby recommend the adoption of arbitration as a just and practical method for the determination of international differences, to be maintained sincerely and in good faith, so that war may cease to be regarded as a proper form of trial between nations.

In 1874 the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate again, through Mr. Hamlin, a member of the committee—Simon Cameron, of Pennsylvania, then being its chairman—responsive to the petitions and memorials which had come to it, as stated in the report, from all over the United States, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the United States, having at heart the cause of peace everywhere, and hoping to help its permanent establishment between nations, hereby recommend the adoption of arbitration as a just and practical method for the determination of international differences, to be maintained sincerely and in good faith, so that war may cease to be regarded as a proper form of trial between nations.

During these periods, Mr. President, unnumbered resolutions of a similar kind were pending in the House of Representatives, responsive to similar appeals made by people from all over the United States. I have not followed all of these resolutions to see what was the ultimate action taken in each case, but I have followed one, which is a resolution reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, in this language:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
February 14, 1890.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President be, and is hereby, requested to invite, from time to time, as fit occasions may arise, negotiations with any government with which the United States has or may have diplomatic relations, to the end that any differences or disputes arising between the two Governments which can not be adjusted by diplomatic agency may be referred to arbitration, and be peaceably adjusted by such means.

The Senate resolution went to the House of Representatives and was passed by the House on the 3d day of April, 1890. So that outside of the unnumbered utterances, only comparatively a few of which I have even alluded to, through committees of this body and of the other House, here there was at last, if not before that time, finally enacted by the concurrent action of the two Houses the solemn enunciation by the Congress of the United States of the declared policy of the United States that in all cases—and the word "all" is comprehensive and admits of no limitation of meaning—that in all cases it should be the effort and the desire of the people of the United States to agree by friendly negotiation for the settlement of all differences, and in the absence of the practicability of such an agreement to submit those differences to the determination of an impartial tribunal.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BACON. With pleasure.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. If the Senator will allow me, if I understand his resolution, it really is predicated upon the assumption that the United States did actually lend aid and assistance through its land and naval powers to accomplish revolution. Is not that so?

Mr. BACON. I desire to say, with all respect to the Senator, that I shall at a future point in my remarks give particular attention to that inquiry. I simply ask now that he may pretermit it until I come to that part. I will not overlook it.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. That is satisfactory.

Mr. BACON. I will only say now, without stopping to discuss that—and asking that the Senator will not require me to do so now—that I do not agree with him as to the proper construction of the resolution, and I will endeavor to show why at the proper time.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. That will be perfectly satisfactory to me. I only wish the Senator to explain fully the scope and meaning of the resolution before he concludes.

Mr. BACON. I shall endeavor to do so.

Mr. President, not only by such action by Congress, but by the utterances of every President of the United States elected since the close of the civil war, there has been the most emphatic and cordial approval and recommendation and advocacy of the pursuance of that pacificatory policy by the United States, without limitation as to the character of the government with which we are to deal in a case of difference other than that they shall be civilized nations.

The first one to which I call attention is an utterance of President Grant, which I find in this same document from which I have been reading. In the memorial which was presented by the New York committee to the Senate through the Committee on Foreign Relations there is this statement:

President Grant, by example and by precept, recommended such a course to his countrymen. In an address to a Philadelphia society, after his return from a voyage around the world, he said:

"Though I have been trained as a soldier and have participated in many battles, there never was a time when, in my opinion, some way could not have been found of preventing the drawing of the sword. I look forward to an epoch when a court recognized by all nations will settle international differences, instead of keeping large standing armies, as they do in Europe."

That was the statement of the great soldier. This memorial, embraced in this document, goes on to say:

Presidents Hayes and Garfield did not hesitate to declare their concurrence in the same views.

We all know the distinguished part played by that most distinguished man from the State of Maine, Mr. Blaine, in the effort to accomplish this result, not only with the nations of the world at large, but particularly with the states of Central and South America. It would be very instructive if I could read all of the circular letter of Mr. Blaine of the date of November 29, 1881, in which he sets out the attitude of the Government of the United States upon this important question and in which he endeavors to inaugurate a congress of all the Central and South American states, together with those of North America, for the purpose of a solemn league and covenant that in any difference which might arise between either of them or between this great and powerful and overshadowing nation and the least of them there should be extended the hand of conciliation, that there should be put behind the thought of force and power and war and bloodshed as the result of such differences, and that there should be an effort by conciliatory means to agree where such differences should arise and in case such agreement could not be had that they would solemnly pledge themselves that such differences should be settled by the determination of a disinterested party and that there should be no appeal to the sword.

I will read some from that famous letter.

I beg to say possibly I am not altogether a good judge of what is most creditable and distinguishing in one who was preeminently a Republican, and, I will add, no less preeminently an American, but I will venture to say that while there may be some things and are many things in his history and career which will challenge more admiration for the brilliancy and ability and power he possessed and displayed, there is no utterance that ever fell from the lips of that distinguished man which will more distinguish him, and properly and rightfully distinguish him, than the sentiments uttered in this famous circular letter and the great movement he sought thereby to inaugurate. If it were not that I felt it would be a trespass, I would read all of it. But I will read only a part. It is a letter addressed to the representatives of the United States in the different countries which he sought to reach:

For some years past—

I am not reading from the beginning of it; I am reading from page 98 of the eighth volume of the Messages and Papers of the Presidents—

For some years past a growing disposition has been manifested by certain states of Central and South America to refer disputes affecting grave questions in international relationship and boundaries to arbitration rather than to the sword. It has been on several such occasions a source of profound satisfaction to the Government of the United States to see that this country is in a large measure looked to by all the American powers as their friend and mediator.

Words to be remembered, I respectfully suggest, when it is not simply a question of friendship and mediation as between two disagreeing Central or South American countries, but when the thing comes closer home to us, and it is a question between this great country and one of those countries, however weak and feeble it may be.

Mr. Arthur was then President, and Mr. Blaine goes on, being then his Secretary of State, as follows:

The just and impartial counsel of the President in such cases has never been withheld, and his efforts have been rewarded by the prevention of sanguinary strife or angry contentions between peoples whom we regard as brethren.

The existence of this growing tendency convinces the President that the time is ripe for a proposal that shall enlist the good will and active cooperation of all the States of the Western Hemisphere, both North and South, in the interest of humanity and for the common weal of nations.

He conceives that none of the governments of America can be less alive than our own to the dangers and horrors of a state of war, and especially of war between kinsmen. He is sure that none of the chiefs of government on the continent can be less sensitive than he is to the sacred duty of making every endeavor to do away with the chances of fratricidal strife, and he looks with hopeful confidence to such active assistance from them as will serve to show the broadness of our common humanity and the strength of the ties which bind us all together as a great and harmonious system of American commonwealths.

Impressed by these views, the President extends to all the independent countries of North and South America an earnest invitation to participate in a general congress to be held in the city of Washington on the 24th day of November, 1882, for the purpose of considering and discussing the methods of preventing war between the nations of America. He desires that the attention of the congress shall be strictly confined to this one great object; that its sole aim shall be to seek a way of permanently averting the horrors of cruel and bloody combat between countries, oftenest of one blood and speech, or the even worse calamity of internal commotion and civil strife; that it shall regard the burdensome and far-reaching consequences of such struggles, the legacies of exhausted finances, of oppressive debt, of onerous taxation, of ruined cities, of paralyzed industries, of devastated fields, of ruthless conscription, of the slaughter of men, of the grief of the widow and the orphan, of embittered resentments that long survive those who provoked them and heavily afflict the innocent generations that come after.

Those are the thrice memorable words of James G. Blaine, Secretary of State, when he held aloft in the name of the great American Republic the ensign of peace and asked all the nations of the Western Hemisphere to rally beneath its folds.

Mr. President, I concede that there was but little thought then in the mind of that great man—this great man entitled in the light of those words to be denominated as the great philanthropist—that his words would be read in the Senate of the United States at a time when the question was not one of conflict between two feeble powers of Central or South America, but when it would be a question of difference between this great and all-powerful Government and one of the weakest of the peoples whom he then conjured to the ways of peace.

But, sir, can any Senator or any citizen of the United States take to himself for a moment the conclusion that while it was proper for the great Government of the United States thus to intercede and counsel the weak nations of this hemisphere that there should be peace among and between them, and that they should settle their differences by agreement, and if not by agreement then by the determination of some impartial tribunal—can the conclusion be taken, I say, by any Senator or citizen of the United States that while that was a legitimate desire and end to be accomplished, it did not relate to a case where the interests of the United States might come in conflict with the interest of one of those nations, or where there might be a controversy between it and one of the feeblest of those peoples?

Mr. QUARLES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BACON. With pleasure.

Mr. QUARLES. I have been very much interested in the discussion of the distinguished Senator. He always illuminates any subject he touches. But I should like to see if we can at this stage of his discussion arrive at something practical.

Mr. BACON. I will endeavor to be practical in my application before I get through. I hope the Senator will allow me to arrive at it by my own course.

Mr. QUARLES. Most assuredly. I would not ask to anticipate any of his discussion, but I was going to ask the learned Senator whether, notwithstanding all he has read and said, he looks upon the question raised by his resolution as belonging to that class of questions which great nations, or small ones either, are in the habit of submitting to arbitration?

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me, if he had been in the Senate all of the time he would have heard me say that I intended, as a corollary to the proposition which I am now endeavoring to submit to the Senate, to discuss that very question, and I propose to do so. If I can not succeed in showing that these differences do belong to this class, of course

The rest is all but leather or prunella.

Mr. QUARLES. That being so, I will not——

Mr. BACON. I do not object to any interruption, the Senator will understand, but I simply beg that he will allow me to answer his question at the point in my argument where I had designed to give attention to that particular inquiry.

Mr. President, the President of the United States, at that time Mr. Arthur, in his annual message of December, 1882, immediately succeeding the date of the circular letter of Mr. Blaine, used this language:

I am unwilling to dismiss this subject—

He was speaking then of the proposition that there should be convoked a congress of all the Central and South American and North American republics for the purpose of agreeing upon the pacific policy which was advocated by Mr. Blaine in the circular letter, and then he adds this:

I am unwilling to dismiss this subject without assuring you of my support of any measures the wisdom of Congress may devise for the promotion of peace on this continent and throughout the world, and I trust that the time is nigh when, with the universal assent of civilized peoples, all international differences shall be determined without resort to arms by the benignant processes of arbitration.

Mr. Harrison, the signally distinguished patriotic man who came from the State of the present occupant of the chair [Mr. BEVERIDGE in the chair], in transmitting to the Senate and House of Representatives the letter of the Secretary of State and the reports adopted by the conference of the American republics in the congress which had theretofore had its sessions in Washington uses this language:

EXECUTIVE MANSION, September 5, 1890.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a letter from the Secretary of State, which is accompanied by three reports adopted by the conference of American nations recently in session at Washington, relating to the subject of international arbitration. The ratification of the treaties contemplated by these reports will constitute one of the happiest and most hopeful incidents in the history of the Western Hemisphere.

BENJ. HARRISON.

That was all there was in the message.

Then comes Mr. Cleveland. I said that almost all of the Presidents since the civil war had advocated this policy. I have thus far given the utterances of every President since the civil war, other than Mr. Johnson, who was elected as Vice-President during the civil war and then succeeded to the office, but on the part of every President elected since the civil war there has been this most emphatic commendation and advocacy of this policy. I have cited from Grant, Hayes, Garfield, and Harrison, and now come to Mr. Cleveland. In the annual message of Mr. Cleveland, December 4, 1893, he uses this language:

By a concurrent resolution passed by the Senate February 14, 1890, and by the House of Representatives on the 3d of April following—

That is the resolution I have already read to the Senate and called attention to the fact that it had been passed by each House—

By a concurrent resolution passed by the Senate February 14, 1890, and by the House of Representatives on the 3d of April following, the President was requested to "invite from time to time, as fit occasions may arise, negotiations with any government with which the United States has or may have diplomatic relations, to the end that any differences or disputes arising between the two governments which can not be adjusted by diplomatic agency may be referred to arbitration and be peaceably adjusted by such means."

That is a quotation from the resolution. The President continues:

April 18, 1890, the international American conference at Washington by resolution expressed the wish that all controversies between the republics of America and the nations of Europe might be settled by arbitration, and recommended that the government of each nation represented in that conference should communicate this wish to all friendly powers. A favorable response has been received from Great Britain in the shape of a resolution adopted by Parliament July 16 last, cordially sympathizing with the purpose in view and expressing the hope that Her Majesty's Government will lend ready cooperation to the Government of the United States upon the basis of the concurrent resolution above quoted.

That is simply introductory to the utterance I now read. He continues:

It affords me signal pleasure to lay this parliamentary resolution before Congress, and to express my sincere gratification that the sentiment of two great and kindred nations is thus authoritatively manifested in favor of the rational and peaceable settlement of international quarrels by honorable resort to arbitration.

And again in 1897, January 11, in transmitting to the Senate the proposed treaty of international arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, President Cleveland uses this language, speaking of the proposed treaty:

Though the result reached may not meet the views of the advocates of immediate, unlimited, and irrevocable arbitration of all international controversies, it is nevertheless confidently believed that the treaty can not fail to be everywhere recognized as making a long step in the right direction, and as embodying a practical working plan by which disputes between the two countries will reach a peaceful adjustment as matter of course and in ordinary routine.

In the initiation of such an important movement—

I omit part of it which does not relate exactly to the point I am after. Further on he says:

The experiment of substituting civilized methods for brute force as the means of settling international questions of right will thus be tried under the happiest auspices. Its success ought not to be doubtful, and the fact that its ultimate ensuing benefits are not likely to be limited to the two countries immediately concerned should cause it to be promoted all the more eagerly. The example set and the lesson furnished by the successful operation of this treaty are sure to be felt and taken to heart sooner or later by other nations, and will thus mark the beginning of a new epoch in civilization.

Profoundly impressed as I am, therefore, by the promise of transcendent good which this treaty affords, I do not hesitate to accompany its transmission with an expression of my earnest hope that it may commend itself to the favorable consideration of the Senate.

Mr. President, that brings us down to the utterances of the ever and universally lamented McKinley. I will say that this is not a sole utterance which I am about to read. When Mr. McKinley was a Member of the House he was one of the foremost advocates of peaceful negotiation for the settlement of differences rather than a resort to war or violence, and, in the failure of peaceful negotiations, to submit all those differences to the determination of an impartial tribunal. When he first took upon himself the great office, when he stood in front of this Capitol to take the oath of office, that first utterance from him contained the declaration of his adherence to this policy. He referred in his inaugural address to the proposed treaty with Great Britain and used this language:

Arbitration is the true method of settlement of international as well as local or individual differences. It was recognized as the best means of adjustment of differences * * * and its application was extended to our diplomatic relations by the unanimous concurrence of the Senate and House of the Fifty-first Congress in 1890. The latter resolution was accepted as the basis of negotiation with us by the British House of Commons in 1893, and upon our invitation a treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain was signed at Washington and transmitted to the Senate for its ratification in January last. Since this treaty is clearly the result of our own initiative; since it has been recognized as the leading feature of our foreign policy throughout our entire national history—

In this statement Mr. McKinley gives affirmation to what I have endeavored to present as the fact to the Senate to-day regarding the settled policy of the United States—the adjustment of difficulties by judicial methods rather than by force of arms; and since it presents to the world the glorious example of reason and peace, not passion and war, controlling the relations between two of the greatest nations in the world, an example certain to be followed by others, I respectfully urge the early action of the Senate thereon, not merely as a matter of policy, but as a duty to mankind. The importance and moral influence of the ratification of such a treaty can hardly be overestimated in the cause of advancing civilization. It may well engage the best thought of the statesmen and people of every country, and I can not but consider it fortunate that it was reserved to the United States to have the leadership in so grand a work.

Mr. President, if Mr. McKinley had been less impressed than he was with the great desire that peaceful negotiations should be the means by which differences should be settled, he might have pretermitted that utterance upon that occasion. He might have reserved it for a direct communication to the Senate, because the Senate was the power which was to deal with the question whether the treaty should be ratified. But, sir, Mr. McKinley, not content with that, took occasion upon the most eventful occasion of his life to say, not only to the Senate, but to all the people of the United States and to all the people of the world, that he was the apostle and the advocate of this benign policy.

Mr. President, I have taken a great deal of time in the effort to present the fact which I might have stated in a sentence, and that is that the people of the United States through memorials without number presented to Congress, and through the utterances of Congress, by direct enactment, and through the utterances through its committees and through unnumbered treaties has been and is most thoroughly committed to the proposition that without exception and without qualification, in proper cases, I will say, in order that I may not overstep the bounds—in all proper cases, with any country, great or small, the policy of this country favored this conciliatory action, involved concessions, if you please, and of arbitration in the failure of such effort through peaceful conciliatory measures. I say I might have stated that in a sentence and gone on, but I desired to put here in consecutive form, not all or by any means a hundredth part of what could be produced here, but enough to show that what Mr. McKinley said in his first inaugural is the truth, that it has been from the foundation of this Government the well-defined, loudly advocated, and persistently pressed policy of the Government and people of the United States that there should be peace between ourselves and other peoples, and that by peaceful means differences between this and other governments should be arranged and settled.

But I preferred, in order that emphasis might be given to it, thus to bring to the attention of the Senate these various utterances. I want to give emphasis to them in order that I might with the more earnestness invoke the conclusion which I will seek to present, that, bound as we are by this solemn plighted faith, repeated innumerable times, this is an occasion where we can not honorably refuse to abide by the rule which we have laid down, which we have so often reiterated, and which we have so uniformly practiced in all cases properly coming within the purview and jurisdiction of such negotiations. I shall endeavor hereafter to show whether this particular controversy does or does not so come within the class of those that should thus be dealt with. Before proceeding I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that in pursuance of all these efforts, of all these utterances, of all these expressions of desire, of all this plighted faith, there was assembled in this city, as the result and under the provisions of an act of the Congress of the United States, a congress of all the Central and South American republics, and also including the Government of Mexico and the Government of the United States.

As a result of that congress there was framed a plan of international arbitration, and that was agreed to by all the representatives of those various governments, and was transmitted by the President of the United States, then Mr. Harrison, to the Congress of the United States. I have already read—and as it is short I will repeat it—the message of President Harrison transmitting the letter of the Secretary of State and the draft of the proposed agreement, in which the President so forcibly gave his adhesion to the general desire and intention of the work of that congress:

EXECUTIVE MANSION, September 2, 1890.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a letter from the Secretary of State, which is accompanied by three reports adopted by the conference of American nations recently in session at Washington, relating to the subject of international arbitration. The ratification of the treaties contemplated by these reports will constitute one of the happiest and most hopeful incidents in the history of the Western Hemisphere.

BENJAMIN HARRISON.

I can not read all of that agreement between all the representatives of the various countries, but here are the first two articles:

The delegates from North, Central, and South America—

Constituting what Mr. Blaine in his circular letter so happily termed "the great and harmonious system of American commonwealths"—

The delegates from North, Central, and South America in conference assembled: Believing that war is the most cruel, the most fruitless, and the most dangerous expedient for the settlement of international differences;

Recognizing that the growth of the moral principles which govern political societies has created an earnest desire in favor of the amicable adjustment of such differences;

Animated by the conviction of the great moral and material benefits that peace offers to mankind, and trusting that the existing conditions of the respective nations are especially propitious for the adoption of arbitration as a substitute for armed struggles;

Convinced by reason of their friendly and cordial meeting in the present conference that the American republics, controlled alike by the principles, duties, and responsibilities of popular government, and bound together by vast and increasing mutual interests, can, within the sphere of their own action, maintain the peace of the continent and the good will of all its inhabitants;

And considering it their duty to lend their assent to the lofty principles of peace, which the most enlightened public sentiment of the world approves;

Do solemnly recommend all the governments by which they are accredited to conclude a uniform treaty of arbitration in the articles following:

ARTICLE I.

The republics of North, Central, and South America hereby adopt arbitration as a principle of American international law for the settlement of the differences, disputes, or controversies that may arise between two or more of them.

ARTICLE II.

Arbitration—

I call attention to this particularly because it is, in a sense, a reply to the inquiry of the junior Senator from Wisconsin:

Arbitration shall be obligatory in all controversies concerning diplomatic and consular privileges, boundaries, territories, indemnities, the right of navigation, and the validity, construction, and enforcement of treaties.

It will be noted that in this Congress of all the American republics, including the United States, there is a distinct recognition that arbitration is obligatory for the settlement of all controversies growing out of the construction of treaties. This will be specially applicable to a subsequent portion of my remarks.

The proposed agreement, or, rather, the proposed treaty which was agreed to, goes on making all the provisions necessary for a complete agreement for arbitration providing the machinery, etc., and I only omit reading the whole of it because of my reluctance to take so much time of the Senate and my unwillingness to unduly encumber the RECORD.

I had here, but I have misplaced it—I hope to get it before I conclude—the statement of Mr. Blaine as to his estimate of that work thus done by that Congress. I desire to state in this connection that there were a number of bills introduced into either House of Congress for the purpose of bringing about this result. One of them was introduced by Mr. McKinley, another one was introduced by the present presiding officer of the Senate, Mr. FRYE, and another one was introduced by our distinguished colleague from Kentucky, now Senator MCCREARY, but then, like Mr. McKinley, an honored member of the House of Representatives, and, by the way, it was that bill introduced by Mr. MCCREARY which passed. It came to the Senate, some alterations were made, and upon a conference the bill was finally passed, which brought about this happy result.

Now, it is true that that treaty has never been enacted as a treaty. It has never been made the law; but it is nevertheless the truth that it expresses the desire and wishes and professed faith of the American people. It had the sanction of the Congress in the proposal for the legislation which brought it about. It had the sanction of more than one President—President Arthur, and President Cleveland, and President Harrison, and President McKinley. There can be no question that, so far as the moral, binding force of it is concerned, it thoroughly committed the American people to the proposition that in all cases of difference between any one of the governments of North, Central, or South America and any other government of those two continents there should be peaceful arrangement, and, if necessary, arbitration.

I may have to read it out of its order when I get it, but I will nevertheless read the estimate of Mr. Blaine of the scope and importance and the great value of the work of that convention or congress in its effort to accomplish the design, to do away with wars or violences of any kind between the governments of North, Central, and South America, and the substitution therefor of peaceful negotiation, and of arbitration in the event of the failure of such negotiation.

Ten years thereafter, under the same authority, by the initiation of the President of the United States, another congress of the North American and Central and South American republics was convened in the City of Mexico; and while they formulated no treaty, in the report which I have before me, and which is entitled "Second International Congress of American States, held at the City of Mexico from October 22, 1901, to January 22, 1902," on pages 10 and 11 in the report made by the commissioners of the United States to the President, of which former Senator Davis, of West Virginia, was chairman, the statement is made that after prolonged effort in the attempt to bring certain Central American States to a consent to arbitration, and in some instances compulsory arbitration, the final outcome of the whole matter was that they agreed they would become signatories to The Hague convention, and in that way put themselves under the terms of that convention and declare it, as they termed it, a part of the international law to be controlling with the governments of North, Central, and South America.

Mr. President, after all the century of effort on the part of the people and Government of the United States to bring about this arrangement for peaceful negotiation and for international arbitration, as a conclusion and as a culmination we had the great Hague treaty, in which the Government of the United States solemnly pledged itself—and not only by the presence of its commissioners, but by the formal ratification of the treaty—that in all proper cases, certain exceptions being made, it would resort to peaceful measures for the settlement of difficulties and not resort to war for their determination.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLAY in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield?

Mr. SPOONER. I am only asking the Senator for information.

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Has the Senator in mind the exceptions to which he referred this morning?

Mr. BACON. I have them right here, and I can read them. I will do so. I wish to read first another matter.

Mr. SPOONER. At your leisure.

Mr. BACON. I will read it in this connection directly, but here is a matter I passed over. I did not have before me the statement by Mr. Blaine of his estimate of the action of the first American conference, which assembled in Washington in the autumn of 1889. Mr. Blaine, then Secretary of State, said of it:

> If in this closing hour the conference had but one deed to celebrate, we should dare call the world's attention to the deliberate, confident, solemn dedication of two great continents to peace, and to the prosperity which has peace for its foundation.

Alluding to the agreement which had just been executed.

Now, I will endeavor to read from The Hague treaty. I have so many papers here that I find it difficult to refer to them readily. Here it is. It is quite a voluminous document and I do not know that I can refer promptly to the particular part concerning which the Senator from Wisconsin makes inquiry. Does the Senator refer to the particular saving clause which was made in favor of the United States? Possibly the Senator will take the document while I proceed and call my attention to that particular part of it.

Mr. SPOONER. I did not refer to that. I referred to the New York memorial. There were some qualifications.

Mr. BACON. There were some.

Mr. SPOONER. There were some exceptions.

Mr. BACON. Is this what the Senator wished to see [handing document]?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes. I did not hear distinctly the qualifications.

Mr. BACON. Now, if the Senator will pardon me, I am coming to a direct discussion of that a little later, and I will then read it, if that will answer his purpose as well.

Mr. SPOONER. I only asked for information. I will look it up.

Mr. BACON. I regard that as quite important, and I intended to use it in a discussion of the question as to whether or not the assumed controversy between this country and Colombia——

Mr. SPOONER. Here is what I referred to [indicating].

Mr. BACON. I am glad the Senator calls my attention to it, because that brings me to say what I possibly should have said before.

Mr. SPOONER. That is not what I directed my inquiry to.

Mr. BACON. I understand; but I am glad my attention has been called to it for this reason: Much that I have quoted from documents and utterances relates to arbitration. The Senate will easily mark the fact that a commission of the Government to the policy of arbitration necessarily involves an adherence to the policy of agreement by treaty, if that is practicable. In other words, the one is connected in the other. There is no possibility of successful contention that a government could be in favor of the submission of a difference to the determination of a neutral and impartial tribunal and not at the same time be thoroughly committed to the proposition that if, without such submission, they can agree among themselves they should do so. I do not suppose there can be any question about that fact. So I have not stopped, as I have gone along, drawing attention to the various utterances in the one case for conciliation and in the other case for arbitration, to call attention to the fact that the advocacy of arbitration necessarily recognizes the advocacy of a conciliatory agreement, if that were possible, as a precedent to any submission to arbitration.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I do not understand, if the Senator please, that there is any very great divergence of view among Senators, or in the country for that matter, with respect to the wisdom of arbitration between countries in proper cases.

Mr. BACON. I am coming to that question.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. That seems to me to be the material question.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me, I have already given assurance that I intended to discuss that question when I reached it in its proper order.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I did not know whether the Senator was ready to touch upon that question or not.

Mr. BACON. If I do not do that, any man who knows the relation of a predicate to a conclusion must, of course, recognize the fact that all I have said goes for nothing. Senators on the other side do not realize that fact and are not more alive to it than I am. I recognize that, and if I do not succeed in doing that, then I have failed; but I want to get at it in the proper way.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. SPOONER. Of course, as to everything the Senator has said in favor of international conciliation, no one will dispute that that ought to be the attitude of nations—peculiarly, perhaps, of this. We will have no antagonism about it on this side of the Chamber, or I think anywhere in the country; and that means, as the Senator well says, a preliminary effort at conciliation.

Mr. BACON. A preliminary effort at conciliation.

Mr. SPOONER. A preliminary effort at adjustment without resort to war.

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. In other words, arbitration before war.

Mr. BACON. Yes; if conciliatory conferences between the parties fail to accomplish an agreement, which will make arbitration unnecessary.

Mr. SPOONER. That is the general result of The Hague treaty. That is happily the trend of the sentiment in the world at this time. But I suppose the Senator will admit that no government yet, however——

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator will let me proceed with that argument. I am coming to that very question.

Mr. SPOONER. However far it may have gone in the way of conciliation and arbitration, no government has ever been willing to submit to foreign arbitrament a question of national honor——

Mr. BACON. I am coming to all those questions.

Mr. SPOONER. Or political rights.

Mr. BACON. Well, yes; that, too.

Now, Mr. President, I am coming to what, of course, is the crucial question in the case, and possibly the long time I have consumed in presenting the evidence of the attitude of the people of this country and its Government for a hundred years has done nothing more than emphasize, as I have stated, what I might have said in a sentence.

At the same time I think it well that there should be presented in this consecutive form somewhat of the history, because I do not want it simply recognized, as it is by all Senators and by the people, that such is the fact. But I want the realization strong, complete, overwhelming, to be in every man's mind and heart that if this is in its nature a proper case for conciliation, if it is a proper case for submission to an impartial tribunal in the event of failure of attempted conciliatory measures, then there is no escape from the conclusion that the United States are, through the utterances and pledges and practice of an hundred years, bound by every sentiment of honor and plighted faith to accord it to Colombia in this instance. I say I do not want it simply recognized as an independent, abstract fact that such has been the pledge and covenant, but I want it home in the heart and conscience of every Senator, which can only be impressed upon them by a review of these unnumbered utterances, both by the people and their government, their Congress, their Presidents, leaving no question whatever as to their settled conviction and purpose. As I have said, I have barely touched upon the record, but enough to indicate what has been for a century the unbroken and most solemnly uttered plighted faith of the people and of the Government in that regard.

Now, Mr. President, I come to the question: Is this a case where the plighted faith of this people and Government for a hundred years places them under obligations to endeavor to settle whatever differences there may be between the United States and Colombia by conciliatory negotiation if possible, and if that is impossible then by impartial arbitration? Are the differences which exist between the two countries and the issues which are presented by them of the character which devolve it as a duty upon this country to attempt their peaceful settlement either by negotiation or by arbitration?

Before I proceed to that I want to answer the question which my learned friend, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. FAIRBANKS], propounded to me as to the terms of this pending resolution, as to whether or not it assumes that any liability exists to Colombia on the part of the United States. I said to the Senator not only that I would endeavor to show that it did not, but that I would answer him then that it did not. An examination of the words of the resolution shows that there is no assumption of any liability on the part of the United States. The resolution simply states the grounds of difference which should be adjusted either by agreement or by arbitration.

I will again say to the Senator, however, what I said to the Senate when I addressed it upon this subject some considerable time ago, and of the resumption of which I have been denied the opportunity by a personal illness of some duration, that that is not the intention of the resolution; that I am not wedded to the phraseology, and that I am perfectly content that there should be taken out of the resolution anything which could be properly construed to assume that. And not only so, but that I am willing that there should be incorporated in the resolution language which shall distinctly negative it, just as was done by Great Britain in the Washington treaty. I certainly can not go further than that.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Would the Senator so far modify it as to exclude the consideration of political questions?

Mr. BACON. Yes; so far as the submission of that class to arbitration. I am content with anything which shall commit the Government of the United States in the face of the world to the proposition that, whatever there may be of difference between the United States and Colombia, the United States, as a great overshadowing power which can not be compelled by this feeble power to do anything, will voluntarily endeavor to agree with it in the settlement of existing differences; and that if it can not come to an agreement by peaceful negotiations it will not assert its great and resistless power, but that it will endeavor to have a determination of such differences and the claims growing out thereof by some impartial tribunal.

Now, in further answer to the question of the Senator from Indiana, I again call his attention to the fact that this resolution contains two propositions—first, that there shall be an effort by negotiations directly between the parties to accomplish by agreement a peaceful settlement; and second, if an agreement can not thus be accomplished, that the questions of difference in that case shall be submitted to some impartial tribunal for determination and settlement. Now, it will be conceded that there are some classes of questions so closely affecting a nation that it would be unwilling to leave their determination to the judgment and will of any third party. But it must also be conceded that there should be no kind of difference that a nation would not be willing to itself endeavor to settle by agreement with the other nation. So all must recognize this as a correct proposition, that never mind what is the cause of difference, whether it relates to the honor of a country or to its internal policy or to anything else, there is no impropriety in the effort by negotiation to agree with the adversary, even though they may be questions which should not be submitted to the arbitration and determination of a third party. In the case of the direct negotiation between the parties there could be no conclusion which was not satisfactory to each party and agreed to by each party. There is no possible escape. So that if I should accede to the suggestion of the Senator from Indiana and have incorporated in this resolution words which would exclude the particular class of questions which he suggests, that exclusion ought not to relate to that part of the resolution which seeks to adjust such differences by negotiation between the parties. That exclusion in such case ought only to extend to the part of the resolution which proposes to submit any questions of difference to arbitration of a third party or tribunal.

And thus it is perfectly apparent that the character of the questions which may be involved can not be urged as an objection to that part of the pending resolution which advises negotiation between the United States and Colombia for the purpose of accomplishing an agreement between them and a peaceful settlement based on such agreement. Senators who oppose that feature of the resolution will have to seek for some other ground on which to base their objections.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. It appears by the note of the Secretary of State to General Reyes of the 5th instant——

Mr. BACON. I am coming to the discussion of that, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Indicates that the questions they proposed for submission to The Hague tribunal were political in their nature.

Mr. BACON. I am coming to that; but I hope the Senator will keep in mind the suggestion which I have just made that, while the exclusion of a question of that kind might properly be made from any agreement providing for arbitration, there is no kind of difference that one party can not honorably talk to another about and settle by a satisfactory agreement between them.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Not for debate.

Mr. BACON. I am willing to yield to the Senator.

Mr. SPOONER. While the Senator is expressing his willingness to accept a modification of the language of the resolution——

Mr. BACON. Anything which preserves the principle of arbitration or conciliatory agreement.

Mr. SPOONER. I want to ask him if he would not be willing to strike out all after the word "Resolved" in the resolution——

Mr. BACON. No.

Mr. SPOONER. And insert: "The approval of the Senate or of Congress, to the tender by the Secretary of State or by the President to Colombia of the good offices of the United States to adjust all matters of difference between the Republic of Panama and the Republic of Colombia, to the end that good fellowship"——

Mr. BACON. I will come later to a discussion of that particular question——

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator is not willing to accept that amendment?

Mr. BACON. I will come to a discussion of that particular amendment before I get through, but I prefer to do it in a regular way, and if I fail to remember it, I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will call my attention to it.

Mr. SPOONER. I had no thought of discussion, but only asked the Senator a question.

Mr. BACON. Yes; but if I do not answer the question before I get through I hope the Senator will do me the kindness to call my attention to it, because, if I fail to do so, it will be through inadvertence. I am coming to that particular discussion, but that is behind this. I am now on the discussion of the vital question in the case: Whether, in view of their plighted faith, their unnumbered asseverations, their league and covenant, existing conditions do not make such a case as calls upon the United States for an attempted agreement for the settlement of any differences between the United States and Colombia, and whether, if such effort at agreement fails, the existing conditions do not, under their unnumbered professions and promises, demand of the United States an agreement for the settlement of these differences by arbitration.

Mr. President, before proceeding with that discussion and adverting to the particular phraseology of the resolution, and without stopping further to analyze it, I wish to again say that if the language of this resolution is susceptible of the construction which the Senator put upon it, to wit, that it assumes liability on the part of the United States Government, I am willing that the language to that extent shall be changed. Not only so, but I am willing that any recognition on the part of the United States Government shall be expressly negatived, just as it was in the case of the Washington treaty at the time when Great Britain entered into a treaty with the United States Government in 1871 or 1872 for submission to a tribunal at Geneva for the adjudication of claims of the latter against the former. There was an express denial by Great Britain of any recognition of liability, and there is no impropriety in the insertion of such words here if desired. There would certainly then be no possibility of the construction to which the honorable Senator from Indiana thinks the resolution is open.

I do not, however, wish to be misunderstood relative to this matter. I think the resolution is all right as it stands and that it is not legitimately subject to the criticism made upon it. Nevertheless I am willing to the change suggested if that will secure the support of Senators on the other side. If, however, such changes will not secure the support of Senators, I prefer that the resolution shall stand as it now is.

I come now to the question as to what is the nature of the difference between the United States and Colombia for the purpose of seeing whether or not such difference is of a kind that this Government in the first place could recognize as a difference on account of which it could treat, not for the purpose of arbitration, but for the purpose of agreement with Colombia.

And first I submit this proposition as a sound one, that it matters not what the differences are or what their nature may be, those differences can be legitimately the subject-matter of conciliatory negotiations between the parties with a view to agreement, because that such negotiations do not submit the determination of any question to a third party, which the Government might not be willing to have anybody else decide for it. It keeps that decision to itself when it does not provide for arbitration by a third party as to those particular questions.

When the Government says, "I will treat with you, I will confer with you, I will negotiate with you as to this, that, or the other question," the Government reserves to itself the power to agree or not to agree to any proposition which the other side may make. Consequently there is no danger that its honor may be in the keeping of somebody else and that a question affecting its honor may be decided adversely by some one else.

When it comes to the question of submission to arbitration, then the case presented is different, and it is important to see whether or not the difference and the claim based thereon are of the class which can properly be submitted by the Government to the determination of some other party.

Mr. President, when this question was before the Senate for discussion upon a former occasion, we had had no communication which indicated what was the character of the claim made by Colombia and what was the character of the issue which the United States Government made upon those claims. We were limited in that consideration simply to the information which we gathered from the public press and from the utterances of parties in an unofficial way by which the public could gather conclusions as to what were the distinct matters in controversy. We knew the fact that Colombia had a representative here; we knew the fact that that representative was in conference with the Secretary of State; and we had the general information that propositions and counter propositions or presentation of claims on the one hand and a denial of the justice and correctness of those claims on the other hand were passing between the parties; but what they were we then did not have the specific information concerning.

Since that time the President of the United States has sent a message, in which he has communicated to Congress the distinct demand made by the representative of Colombia and the distinct reply of the representative of this Government, the Secretary of State. So that we do now know what the controversy is and what the issues are. Senators on the other side, at the time the matter was heretofore before the Senate, said that they did not know—I certainly did not—what was the character of the demands which were made; but we do know now. Here, in the communication sent to us by the President, is a long letter, in the first place, from the Colombian special minister (General Reyes) to Mr. Hay, which I will not stop to read in full; but on page 25 there is a distinct statement by General Reyes of the grounds of complaint against the United States Government and of the demands which he makes in consequence thereof. In the letter from General Reyes to Mr. Hay of January 6 he uses the language which I am about to read.

Whatever may be my personal opinion, I beg the Senate, before I read the language, to bear in mind that I am in no manner in this presentation asserting that any single thing that General Reyes says is correct or that any single proposition he makes is maintainable. I am simply trying to show what the controversy is, so that whatever may be the personal views of any Senator relative to the merits of the controversy he may still recognize the propriety of providing a means for the peaceful settlement of that controversy. I read it simply as his assumption, without, for the purpose of this argument, any recognition whatever of the correctness of any fact stated or any conclusion drawn; and then I propose to read the issue made thereon by Mr. Hay in his reply; and those two things join the issue. Then the question is presented whether that issue is of a character which could, in the first place, be properly dealt with by friendly negotiation without any reference to arbitration, and, in the second place, whether or not, in the absence of an agreement, it furnishes a legitimate subject-matter for arbitration under the recognized policy of this Government in that regard.

I will not read all of General Reyes's contentions nor all of the claims he makes, but simply the clear-cut proposition, on page 25, of the grievances of Colombia, as he alleges them to be, against the United States. He says in his letter of January 6:

> Mr. SECRETARY: I have received the note which your excellency did me the honor to address to me under date of the 30th of December last, in answer to mine of the 29th of the same month. I transmitted it by cable to my Government and have received from it instructions to make to your excellency's Government the following declarations:
> First. That the said note of the 30th of December from your excellency is regarded by my Government as an intimation that the Colombian forces will be attacked by those of the United States on their entering the territory of Panama for the purpose of subduing the rebellion, and that for that reason, and owing to its inability to cope with the powerful American squadron that watches over the coasts of the Isthmus of Panama, it holds the Government of the United States responsible for all damages caused to it by the loss of that national territory.

There is the distinct statement of the claim and the grounds upon which it is based.

> Second. That since the 3d of November last the revolution of Panama would have yielded, or would not have taken place, if the American sailors and the agents of the Panama Canal had not prevented the Colombian forces from proceeding on their march toward Panama, and that I, as commander in chief of the army of Colombia, would have succeeded in suppressing the revolution of Panama as early as the 20th of the same month if Admiral Coghlan had not notified me in an official note that he had orders from his Government to prevent the landing of Colombian forces throughout the territory of the Isthmus.

Then, on page 26, he says:

> Ninth. That on the grounds above stated the Government of Colombia believes that it has been despoiled by that of the United States of its rights and sovereignty on the Isthmus of Panama, and not being possessed of the material strength sufficient to prevent this by the means of arms (although it does not forego this method, which it will use to the best of its ability), solemnly declares to the Government of the United States:
> First. That the Government of the United States is responsible to that of Colombia for the dismemberment that has been made of its territory by the separation of Panama, by reason of the attitude that the said Government assumed there as soon as the revolution of the 3d of November broke out.

I repeat that, even if for the purpose of the argument that is recognized by us as an utterly unfounded claim, it is nevertheless the claim made, and that is on the one side. Now, Mr. Hay takes issue with General Reyes, and makes the statement which is found on pages 23 and 24 of the same document. It is true that Mr. Hay's contention is stated in a letter written prior to that time, but it is made by Secretary Hay in response to a letter previously written to him by General Reyes, in which practically the same contention was made, so that the issue is joined in that way. I only read from the subsequent letter of General Reyes to Mr. Hay, because he therein more concisely states the proposition than he did in the previous letter. Here is the contention of the United States on those issues:

> By the declaration of independence of the Republic of Panama a new situation was created. On the one hand stood the Government of Colombia invoking in the name of the treaty of 1846 the aid of this Government in its efforts to suppress the revolution; on the other hand stood the Republic of Panama that had come into being in order that the great design of that treaty might not be forever frustrated, but might be fulfilled. The Isthmus was threatened with desolation by another civil war, nor were the rights and interests of the United States alone at stake, the interests of the whole civilized world were involved. The Republic of Panama stood for those interests; the Government of Colombia opposed them. Compelled to choose between these two alternatives, the Government of the United States, in no wise responsible for the situation that had arisen, did not hesitate. It recognized the independence of the Republic of Panama, and upon its judgment and action in the emergency the powers of the world have set the seal of their approval.
> In recognizing the independence of the Republic of Panama the United States necessarily assumed toward that Republic the obligations of the treaty of 1846. Intended, as the treaty was, to assure the protection of the sovereign of the Isthmus, whether the government of that sovereign ruled from Bogota or from Panama, the Republic of Panama, as the successor in sovereignty of Colombia, became entitled to the rights and subject to the obligations of the treaty.

Mr. FAIRBANKS rose.

Mr. BACON. The Senator will pardon me. I think I can anticipate what he wants to ask. He will let me state it before he asks anything in regard to it, if he pleases.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I will not interrupt the Senator if he is going to answer the question.

Mr. BACON. I will answer straight away. If I do not, I hope the Senator will interrupt me.

Now, if we assume for the purposes of this argument that every word that the Secretary of State says is true and that every word and conclusion drawn is correct, and if, on the other hand, we assume for the purposes of the argument that every word that the Colombian minister says is untrue and that every conclusion that he draws is unwarranted, nevertheless these conflicting claims and contentions make the issue. As to what the issue is, in part, I apprehend that the question the Senator was about to ask me is this, Whether or not the question of the right of our Government to recognize another government should be submitted to arbitration?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. The Senator has anticipated the question I was going to ask.

Mr. BACON. Of course; and I most unhesitatingly say it should not be. I agree with the utterance of the Department of State that that is not a proper subject-matter of arbitration. But that is not the whole of the issue by a great deal. There is another important issue involved here that is entitled to consideration, and I am coming to specifics about it. Before proceeding to discuss that I will say to the Senator from Indiana that while the question of recognition, rightful or wrongful, of the independence of Panama could not be deemed a proper subject-matter of negotiation for arbitration, that question could be a matter for conference and agreement between the parties. However impossible it might be that the United States would ever concede any liability on account of such recognition, there could be no difficulty or impropriety in treating with Colombia with the view of removing irritation and hostile feelings which have been caused thereby.

But there is another point at issue raised between the two Governments by these conflicting claims and denials. On the one hand, it is contended by the Colombian minister that the United States Government has incurred a liability by reason of the fact that it prohibited, by the use of its armed forces, the Colombian Government from asserting its authority and thereby prevented Colombia from quelling rebellion. What is the reply that the Secretary of State makes to that? The Secretary of State admits it.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Admits what?

Mr. BACON. Probably it will be better that I read what the Secretary of State says. The Secretary of State, in replying to the statement that Colombia has been wronged in that regard, says that when the United States had recognized the Government of Panama the treaty obligations which they had previously undertaken with Colombia inured to Panama, and that instantly, as soon as the recognition was made, the Government of the United States, by reason of the obligations of that treaty, was in a position where it was justified and required to use force to prevent any hostile demonstration by Colombia for the reassertion of its sovereignty in Panama, because so soon as Panama became by the recognition of the United States the sovereign of the Isthmus the obligation was instantly imposed upon the United States by the treaty of 1846 to protect the sovereignty of Panama in the Isthmus against all the world, including Colombia herself.

Mr. SPOONER. Right there let me ask, Does the Senator propose to submit that contention to arbitration?

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will allow me to proceed, I will state what it is. I do not think any Senator can think from what I am saying that I am trying to evade the question.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not think that.

Mr. BACON. Before proceeding to answer that question I wish to state with somewhat more of elaboration what I understand from this correspondence to be the claim of the Colombian Government on the one hand and the contention of the United States in reply thereto on the other hand.

The Colombian Government, through General Reyes, says that the United States, by use of their powerful squadron and by the use of their armed forces, prevented Colombia from using her forces to suppress the rebellion in Panama, and that in the absence of such intervention on the part of the United States and the protection thus given to the Panama revolution the rebellion would have been speedily suppressed, and that, in fact, it would never have taken place; and that by reason of such forcible action by the United States in aiding and protecting the revolutionists in Panama the Colombian Government has been despoiled by that of the United States of its rights and sovereignty on the Isthmus of Panama, and that the United States are responsible for the dismemberment of the territory of Colombia.

Our Secretary of State in his reply admits that the United States protected the sovereignty of the Republic of Panama as against Colombia by armed force, and justifies the action under the treaty of 1846 with Colombia, or New Granada, which is the same thing. The contention of the Secretary is that whereas in the treaty of 1846 the United States guaranteed the rights of sovereignty and property of Colombia in the Isthmus of Panama, so soon as Panama seceded and her independence was acknowledged all the rights of Colombia under that treaty inured to Panama, and that on the instant the United States became obligated by the treaty to protect the sovereignty of Panama in the entire Isthmus, even as against Colombia, with whom the treaty was originally made; that therefore the United States were justified in protecting the revolutionary government in Panama and in preventing by armed force Colombia from using her forces in suppressing the rebellion.

The clause in the treaty of 1846 upon which the Secretary of State bases this contention is found in the thirty-fifth article, and is as follows:

> And in consequence the United States also guarantee, in the same manner, the rights of sovereignty and property which New Granada (Colombia) has and possesses over said territory.

Under that clause of the treaty of 1846 the Secretary contends that the United States were right in protecting the new Panama Republic against the effort of Colombia to suppress the rebellion which set it up. The statement made by him to this effect in the extract already quoted is as follows:

> In recognizing the independence of the Republic of Panama the United States necessarily assumed toward that Republic the obligations of the treaty of 1846. Intended, as the treaty was, to assure the protection of the sovereign of the Isthmus, whether the government of that sovereign rules from Bogota or from Panama, the Republic of Panama, as the successor in sovereignty of Colombia, became entitled to the rights and subject to the obligations of the treaty.

From this it is seen that Colombia claims that the United States, by forcibly preventing Colombia from suppressing the rebellion, caused the dismemberment of her territory. The United States admit the protection of the Republic of Panama as against Colombia, and assert their duty so to do under the treaty of 1846, and thus the issue is clearly joined between the two.

Upon this issue thus presented the question whether or not the contention of the Secretary of State is correct is a question as to the correct interpretation of the treaty of 1846.

Now, the point I am coming to is this: The Senator from Wisconsin asked me whether that claim of Colombia on the one hand, and the contention of the United States on the other hand, constitute an issue which is a proper subject-matter of arbitration. I lay down this as a proposition, that the question of the proper construction of a treaty, including the question of whether there has been wrong done in the violation of a treaty, is a question which, above all questions, is recognized as the simplest and most natural question for treaty negotiation, for agreement, if possible, and for submission to other parties for decision, if such agreement can not be had. If there can be any successful dispute of that as a correct proposition I do not know where to find the basis upon which to rest the argument.

Mr. President, the Government of the United States makes no claim of any right in Colombia, makes no argument in justification of anything which has been done there, which is not based on rights, duties, and powers under the treaty of 1846. The whole question at controversy is one which grows out of the question of the construction of that treaty. The message of the President of the United States is one which bases the action of the Government of the United States upon the construction of that treaty; every argument which has been made in this Chamber in defense of what has been done has been necessarily based upon the question of the construction of that treaty; every argument which assails or disputes the propriety of the action which has taken place is based on the question of the construction of that treaty, and the question of the construction of a treaty is of all questions one which is a proper subject-matter of adjudication and arrangement either by agreement of the parties or by arbitration where such agreement can not be reached.

But in order that there may be no mistake about this matter——

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?—for I want to get at his position.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. What is the real dispute?

Mr. BACON. I am sorry the Senator was not in the Chamber when I stated it.

Mr. SPOONER. I am always sorry if I am out of the Chamber when the Senator is addressing the Senate. The Senator knows we can not be here all the time.

Mr. BACON. I understand that.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like, in a word, if the Senator will point out the precise basis of his observation that all that is in dispute here involves the construction of a treaty.

Mr. BACON. I have just stated it. I will state to the Senator—he has this document before him, and I do not want to read it over again.

Mr. SPOONER. But the Senator can state to me his contention.

Mr. BACON. I am endeavoring to do it.

Mr. SPOONER. I know that Secretary Hay contends that article 35 of the treaty of 1846, in its obligations as well as in its grant, upon the independence of the Republic of Panama, being a local obligation, became transferred to the Republic of Panama.

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. And it is claimed, and I think correctly, that the corollary of that is that our corresponding correlative obligations that once had run to the Republic of Colombia were transferred to the Republic of Panama. Now, is it that dispute on that question which the Senator proposes to submit to some foreign tribunal?

Mr. BACON. Not necessarily, if it can be arranged through friendly and conciliatory negotiations between the two Governments.

Mr. SPOONER. I want to remind the Senator, if that be true, that there are three parties now, if Colombia be one, interested in that subject—the United States, the Republic of Panama, and Colombia.

I should like, if I can, to get at precisely what the Senator proposes.

Mr. BACON. The Senator would get at it very much more quickly if he would let me proceed.

Mr. SPOONER. All right. I think that is true.

Mr. BACON. I repeat the proposition in brief. My proposition is that these documents, contained in the communication sent to us by the President, show that there is a controversy between the United States and Colombia, and that even if for the purposes of the argument we admit that there is no sound basis for the claim of Colombia it is nevertheless a controversy, and the fact is plain that that controversy grows out of the construction of the treaty of 1846.

Mr. SPOONER. If that is to become the rule, it will any day rest in the power of any government with which we have a treaty to force us into a position where we must submit the interpretation of that treaty to some foreign tribunal. If the merits of the controversy are not to be considered at all, if it is only that one party asserts it, however silly it may be, and the other denies it, and then this great principle of conciliation requires the submission of it to arbitration, I do not know what would become of treaties.

Mr. BACON. While I do not wish to discuss the merits of the controversy, I scarcely think that the denial of the remarkable contention of the Secretary of State will be pronounced to be "silly." Without discussing that, I simply repeat the proposition which I think the Senator will find it very difficult to controvert upon authority, that a controversy which grows out of a dispute as to the construction of a treaty and acts done under that treaty are recognized as proper matters of negotiation for arbitration. Now, if the Senator can produce any authority contrary to that, I should be very glad to see it. But I was about to say when the Senator interrupted me——

Mr. SPOONER. I beg pardon.

Mr. BACON. The Senator need not beg my pardon, because he is always at liberty to interrupt me, and he knows it. I only desire, in the interest of time, when I am trying to elucidate a certain point, that the Senator will let me proceed to do it, and if I fail, at the end of my effort in that regard, I shall be more than happy to have his suggestion to that effect.

The question of submission to arbitration is not the first or the main question in the resolution. It is the secondary question and the minor consideration. The main proposition and the one of greatest importance is that we will in a conciliatory spirit endeavor to agree with Colombia.

So, Mr. President, all I have said in reference to the committing of this great people and Government to the policy of arbitration is with the view of the recognition of the fundamental proposition, with which the Senator himself has already expressed his agreement, that every word said in favor of arbitration necessarily involves and implies the prior willingness of the governments to agree between themselves if they can do so. If that is the block in the way, if Senators are willing to say they are ready to adopt a resolution which shall simply advise the President that it is the sense of the Senate that there shall be negotiations opened with a view to negotiating a treaty for the settlement of all the differences between the two countries, without specifying what they are, I will accept that and be glad to have it done. It meets the great object that I have in view.

Sir, I have said that the purpose I had was to manifest a proper friendly spirit to this people and arrange for a peaceful settlement of our differences, and that we should not plant ourselves upon our strength and our might and say to those people: "While you think you have been wronged we know you have not been wronged, and as we know it we do not propose even to talk to you about it, and we will not treat with you or hear your complaint." That was the attitude of some here two weeks ago when the discussion was had. Senators on the other side of the Chamber then waxed indignant at the bare suggestion that the United States should even entertain or consider the proposition to treat with Colombia. They scoffed at and spurned it. The great and all powerful United States were not to even discuss the matter with this weak and feeble nation. That is what I object to.

It is excellent
To have a giant's strength; but it is tyrannous
To use it like a giant.

Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] asks me to read the closing part of the memorial presented to the Senate in 1888 by David Dudley Field and others of the committee from New York, in which there was a specification of the class of cases which properly would be included in a treaty providing for a court of arbitration. I now read, for the purpose of my argument, and also in response to the request of the Senator previously made, as follows:

> We beg therefore most respectfully to ask from Congress the passage of a joint resolution requesting the President to propose to the Government of Great Britain the making of a treaty between the two nations, for a limited period at least, providing in substance that in case a difference should arise between them respecting the interpretation of any treaty—

That is the first specification—

> which they have made or may hereafter make with each other, or any claim of either under the established law of nations, or respecting the boundary of any of their respective possessions, or respecting any wrong alleged to have been committed by either nation upon the other or its members, or any duty omitted, it shall be the earnest endeavor of both the contracting parties to accommodate the difference by conciliatory negotiation—

That is the first thing, and that is what we want in this case—

> and that in no event shall either nation begin a war against the other without first offering to submit the difference between them to arbitrators, chosen as may be then agreed, or if there be no different agreement, then by three arbitrators, one to be chosen by each party and an umpire by those so chosen; it being understood, however, that arbitration as thus provided for shall not extend to any question respecting the independence or sovereignty of either nation, its equality with other nations, its form of government, its internal affairs, or its continental policy.

It will be noted that the very first dispute mentioned as furnishing properly a subject-matter for negotiation is any difference arising "respecting the interpretation of any treaty." It is really difficult to argue concerning a proposition so self-evident as that of difference respecting the interpretation of a treaty. If such a difference is to be excluded, what possible dispute of a serious nature between nations could be included? As reflective of American sentiment, I read to the Senate two editorial utterances of recent date which have appeared in prominent newspapers.

The first is from the Courier-Journal, as follows:

> There is nothing in the Bacon resolution which should so palpitate the honest heart. That resolution does not say that we shall pay Colombia for lost sovereignty over Panama. It merely proposes that we pay her if we have done her any wrong, and if we and Colombia are unable to agree whether we have done her any wrong, it leaves that, with other points on which we may differ, to arbitration. What is there in that which should cause clean hands to clench with rage, a clear conscience to seethe with commotion? If the Administration has not wronged Colombia, then, under the terms of the resolution, we should not have to pay Colombia.
> If negotiation or arbitration should prove that no such wrong was done by the Administration, then surely the Administration's innocence of such allegations would stand more clearly established before the world than it is by the Administration's mere word of assertion and protestation. And if negotiation or arbitration should show that we wronged Colombia, then why should we not pay her for what we have taken and propose to keep, without resorting to the Administration's roundabout and disingenuous method of paying for it by guaranteeing Panama's promises to pay.

The second is from the Independent, which, while approving of the action taken by the United States in Panama, advocates arbitration of the differences with Colombia growing out of such action. The editorial is as follows:

> Senator BACON has offered a resolution in the Senate proposing to refer to the Court of The Hague the question whether the United States owes reparation to Colombia for damage to her done by our action in securing or protecting the independence of Panama. We see no objection to that, for we want to make the most of arbitration, whether as a preventive to war or as a means to secure international justice—but, provided that Colombia first accepts the independence of Panama. That is an accomplished fact, achieved by the people of Panama, and having our full sympathy, recognized but not inaugurated by us. But as to this there is a sharp difference of view between Colombia and the United States.
> We declare that we have done absolutely nothing that is not justified by the law of nations and the treaty of 1846, while Colombia declares that we have unjustly prevented her from maintaining her supremacy over the Isthmus, to her serious loss and injury, such as she is entitled to go to war to assert her right. This is a question of fact and interpretation. If our officers have really done what Colombia asserts, we ought to pay damages; and if they have not done wrong, our innocence will be made clear to the world by such a reference, and we shall be on better terms with Colombia and all South America for such a decision. Accordingly, under proper provisions, we should favor such a reference to The Hague Court of the main question between Colombia and this country. Whether our officers were right or wrong, we ought to be equally ready to abide by the verdict of such an august tribunal of the nations.

There is to my mind no possible escape from the proposition that the controversy arises out of the construction of a treaty. We claim no right in Colombia or in Panama except under that treaty; they claim no right against us except as they claim a violation of that treaty; and, so far as the books can show, I do not think the industry of the Senator from Wisconsin or any other Senator can find anything which controverts the proposition that so far as a difference arising out of a treaty is concerned it is a proper subject-matter of arbitration; but, whether a proper subject-matter of arbitration or not, it is in the language of this memorial a proper subject-matter for "conciliatory negotiation."

If Senators desire to meet this proposition upon grounds that they can approve, I am perfectly willing that this resolution shall be limited to the matter of conciliatory negotiations as to all differences between the parties. I do not think it can possibly be subject to any criticism there, that the Government would in any manner imperil its honor, or that a matter would be in negotiation between them about which nations ought not to negotiate with each other with a view to the prevention of differences.

The Senator from Wisconsin has asked me a question, to which I will now endeavor to reply, to wit, whether or not I would be willing that the resolution should simply provide that this Government would tender its good offices for the purpose of reconciling any differences between Colombia and Panama. I have two answers to that. In the first place, such a resolution would not touch the question as to the differences between Colombia and the United States. However much we may deny the correctness of any position taken by Colombia, we must recognize the fact that there is a contention on her part which, even if we deny its correctness, we should in a friendly spirit endeavor to settle and arrange by conciliatory negotiation. Therefore the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin would not in any manner cover that phase of the case.

Another thing which I desire to say, in all respect to the Senator, is this: If a guardian held an infant in his arms, and there was a cause of controversy between that guardian and a grown man, another grown man, relative to some property interest of that infant, the guardian might as well say: "I will exercise my good offices to arrange amicably the differences between this baby in my arms and yourself." We know, Mr. President, that so far as Panama is concerned she is there simply to do what we say about this whole matter.

We know another thing, that if this is an accomplished revolution Colombia has no claim against Panama. There might be some question about prorating the preexisting debt or something of that sort, but when a country achieves its independence and its independence is an accomplished fact, the country from which it has been wrested has no claim against the country which thus achieves its independence.

What is the claim that Colombia has against Panama? None whatever except the claim of a right to sovereignty over it. Is that a matter for negotiation? Is that a matter for settlement? Here is Colombia, whatever else the balance of the world has done, denying that its sovereignty has been rightfully wrested from it. If its denial is untrue, if its sovereignty has been wrested from it, then Colombia has no claim against Panama which Panama can for a moment consider. To consider it would be to admit that her independence had not been achieved.

Did the Government of Great Britain have any claim against the thirteen colonies when they achieved their independence? What they had won by the sword left no obligation from them to the Government from which they had won it. If Panama independence has been achieved, it is idle to talk about the claim of Colombia against Panama. Are we here to waste words?

Colombia contends that she has been aggrieved and damaged by the United States, and under the suggestion of the honorable Senator from Wisconsin we are to answer that contention by saying to her, "We will try to settle the difference between you and Panama and make Panama comply with the obligations that she has to you," when we know, when every man in the Senate, who is necessarily familiar with international law to that effect, knows that when Panama has achieved her independence there is no obligation left on the part of Panama to Colombia. And yet we are to answer the question as to whether or not there is a grievance on the part of Colombia against the United States by saying to her in that empty way, "We will try to see that whatever Panama owes you is paid," or words to that effect, when we know it does not owe her anything.

Nobody disputes the right of the Senate to address this communication to the President if it is a proper subject-matter, if the circumstances warrant it. It is recognized in numerous precedents that it is proper for the Senate to advise the President in advance of what it conceives to be a proper subject-matter for a treaty.

Senators contended on the 12th of January, the day when this resolution was presented and debated in the Senate, that it was improper to suggest that there should be any negotiations. That, at that time, was their opinion—on the 12th. It seems on the very next day after this resolution was thus presented and debated, the 13th, however, the Secretary himself, as is shown by this communication which has been sent here by the President, did suggest negotiations. On page 32 of this document is the statement by Mr. Hay that he is willing to the following:

> First. To submit to a plebiscite the question whether the people of the Isthmus prefer allegiance to the Republic of Panama or to the Republic of Colombia.
> Second. To submit to a special court of arbitration the settlement of those claims of a material order which either Colombia or Panama by mutual agreement may reasonably bring forward against the other, as a consequence of facts preceding or following the declaration of independence of Panama.

I think those submissions would be entirely ineffectual—I mean they would accomplish no good; and at the same time it is a step in the direction of negotiations with Panama. If the introduction of this resolution on the 12th and the debate in the Senate on that day stimulated the Secretary to his action on the 13th, as much as that action fell short of the requirements of the situation, the resolution has nevertheless not been entirely fruitless in the initiation of negotiations between the United States and Panama.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. The offices were to be extended in order to bring about proper relations between Panama and Colombia.

Mr. BACON. Yes, I understand. But it is evident that Panama is only used as a buffer in a transaction to which she is not a party.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. The Secretary says:

> This Government is now, as it always has been, and as I have frequently had the honor to inform your excellency, most desirous to lend its good offices for the establishment of friendly relations between the Republic of Colombia and that of Panama.

Mr. BACON. I understand that, and he also suggested that the United States would be willing to submit to a court of arbitration the settlement of claims between Colombia and Panama, which, as I have already endeavored to show, replying to the Senator from Wisconsin, would amount to nothing. It looks very much like the case I have just put, as an illustration, of a guardian with a baby in his arms offering his good offices to settle differences between another man and that baby. The only practical thought connected with the suggestion of the Secretary is that the United States feel constrained to make reparation to Colombia, but prefer to do it in the name of Panama. Which is the manlier, nobler method—that one, or the open, frank method of negotiating directly with Colombia and coming to an agreement with her without masquerading behind little Panama?

But I want to call the attention of Senators to the statement of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] yesterday, made in this Chamber. In speaking about this very question of the relations between Colombia and the United States, the Senator said this:

> And not upon negotiations—

Speaking about the question of information to be had from the State Department or from the President—

> And not upon negotiations of a difficult and delicate character, perhaps, which are now going on between some of these governments in regard to matters which have grown up since the treaty was negotiated.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. From what page of the RECORD does the Senator read?

Mr. BACON. Page 1308.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The Senator from Rhode Island is absent from the Chamber. If he were here, I do not think he would admit that he stated upon his knowledge that negotiations were now pending.

Mr. BACON. No; he said "perhaps."

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Yes.

Mr. BACON. He said "perhaps." I have read his language.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It was by way of illustration, as I understood it.

Mr. BACON. Of course those of us who are not on the inner circle have not definite information, and it is to be regretted that we are now told by some who are on the inner circle that he did not mean what we understood him to mean.

I repeat what I said upon a former occasion—that I recognize as a concluded fact the revolution in Panama, and that it is not going to be undone. I want to add to that another fact which I recognize as an undoubted one, and that is that there is to be no more controversy as to where the canal is to be dug. I recognize that it is going to be built at Panama.

These are two recognized facts, to my mind, and out of them there grows to me this conclusion: That viewed from a selfish standpoint there is no more important duty resting upon the Government of the United States now than to remove whatever cause of friction or of ill feeling there may be between the Government of the United States and the Government of Colombia; and I think that being an accomplished fact, the revolution being an accomplished fact, the Government of Colombia having no possible opportunity in the future to be recompensed for whatever it may claim to have suffered by any restoration of this territory, the only possibility being that she may be recompensed in some other way, I am strongly of the opinion that the very best investment we could make in connection with this matter would be a liberal concession to that country which would remove the present feeling of hostility and make those people our friends in the future.

There is one feature of this controversy about which there can be a conciliatory negotiation without compromising any honor or any suggestion of it, and that is this: There is no question about the fact that Colombia denies the loss of her sovereignty in Panama: that she denies the independence of that country. In other words, that she still claims it as a part of her territory, and will again subject it to her authority if she can ever do so.

We, on the other hand, say that the title of Panama to her independence is complete; but nevertheless there is the claim of Colombia, out of which controversy will grow and future difficulty will grow. Is there any dishonor in our negotiating with Colombia that she shall make a quitclaim to that title? I would be willing to pay to Colombia ten times as much as I think her claim is worth, or a hundred times, if you please, if thereby peace is going to be had between Colombia and the United States.

It matters not that it may be, as suggested by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] the other day, that there is no danger of an outbreak of war.

If there are hostile relations between that country and this country, we are necessarily committed for an indefinite time to a condition of predatory or guerrilla warfare, if no other. We are thereby necessarily put into a position where we must maintain a suitable army there. We are necessarily put in a position where even though there is no open declaration of war we will have to protect that property against the predatory bands of an unfriendly people and protect those who are there engaged either in the construction of the canal or its operation, and what that will cost will outweigh a dozen times the amount of money that we would pay to that country and thereby get friendly relations between us. And, sir, this condition of hostility with the Colombian people will not only cost us treasure; it will during long-continued years cost us the lives of our soldiers, officers, and men—lives compared with the value of which the money necessary to make these people again our friends is as dust in the balance.

Mr. President, another suggestion. I have no doubt that the time is coming—in what way or when, I do not know—when the United States Government is going to secure the possession of that Isthmus and own it. When that comes I do not wish that Colombia shall have this unsettled claim with which to harass us. If we are to construct the canal successfully and without undue cost and without the loss unnecessarily of life and treasure, it is important that we should have the friendship of that people.

If we are to operate the canal and protect it successfully thereafter, without undue cost and sacrifice, it is necessary that we should have their friendship and cooperation, and the only way to have their friendship is to agree with them, by the way, before it is too late. We should, as his constitutional advisers, say to the President: "We advise that there shall be such conciliatory negotiations between this country and Colombia as will bring about, as soon as practicable, a friendly condition of affairs."

Mr. President, another thing. Does any man doubt that even if that country is——

Mr. SPOONER. That is a very different thing from your resolution.

Mr. BACON. No; it is not. The first part of the resolution refers exclusively to negotiations looking to an agreement between the two nations and will include all kinds and subjects of friendly and conciliatory negotiations.

Mr. SPOONER. But, Mr. President, if I may take just a moment, the first part of the resolution refers to the negotiation of a treaty. I never heard before of the Senate advising the President to negotiate a treaty for ratification by the Senate unless the Senate was of opinion that there was some substantial and honest difference whereby we became equitably indebted or beholden to the other government.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me, exactly the opposite of that was the case on the part of Great Britain in the Washington treaty. The United States claimed that the Government of Great Britain was indebted to citizens of the United States by reason of the fact that the Government of Great Britain had not restrained war vessels which were to be used by the Confederate government from departing from their ports; that by reason of that neglect on the part of Great Britain those vessels did depart from their ports and preyed upon the commerce of the United States, and that therefore the British Government was under liability and obligation to make good the losses.

Now, when it came to the negotiation of that treaty, the British Government, while it agreed to the treaty for arbitration, expressly said in the body of the treaty that it did not recognize that there was any liability on its part. So that is a case exactly in point with the suggestion of the honorable Senator and fully answers his criticism.

It is entirely competent, if there is a controversy between two nations, for a nation which utterly disowns and disavows any liability to say: "For the purpose of the settlement of this controversy, wherein we deny our liability, we will enter into a treaty with you looking to its determination and settlement in some way, either by conciliatory negotiation or by arbitration." In every case the controversy is due to the fact that one party makes a claim which is denied by the other party. That makes the issue, and it is the existence of that issue which calls for adjudication by arbitration. So the Senator, I think, is entirely wrong in that contention.

Another thought not unworthy of our consideration, Mr. President, is that even if Colombia is too feeble to go to war with us, even if she recognizes her feebleness to the extent that she makes no declaration of war and attempts to wage no war, the very fact that she permits the accomplishment of the revolution in Panama without an attempt to prevent it will certainly throw that country into the throes of civil war.

Mr. President, in view of all our professions concerning our care and regard for the American republics, are we under no moral obligation, in the presence of such a situation as that? Are we under no moral obligation even to treat with a country with a view to arriving at some agreement which will soothe their wounded and angry pride and which will prevent these internal commotions among her people?

I confess, sir, that there was pity stirred within me when I read the extract from the letter of General Reyes to Secretary Hay of December 23, 1903, which is found on page 9 of the communication sent in to us by the President of the United States. It is as follows:

> Sad indeed is the fate of my country, condemned at times to suffer calamities from its own revolutions and at others to witness the unexpected attacks of a powerful but friendly State, which for the first time breaks its honored traditions of respect for right—especially the right of the weak—to deliver us pitilessly to the unhappy hazards of fortune.

Then another thing, Mr. President, we have American citizens in that country who own property, and they are jeopardized by this condition.

I have a letter now from a citizen in my own town, whose brother resides in Colombia. This brother, whose business and property are in the interior of that country, has gone to Cartagena because he is afraid to stay in the interior. He writes to his brother that he fears and apprehends the loss of all his property on account of the unfriendly nature of the feelings of the people of that country to the people of the United States, growing out of this proposition. This is doubtless only one of many similar instances.

I am, sir, willing for one, and I believe the American people are willing, that we should deal liberally with the Colombians, because, I repeat, what are a few paltry millions to this great Government compared with the great advantage to this Government of making a friendly, satisfactory arrangement with that people?

I have heard it said—I do not know whether truly or not, I do not pretend to say now that it is true, but it is repeated around—that the Government of Colombia has proposed to the United States that it will be entirely satisfied, that it will produce a restoration of good feeling, that it will surrender all claims on Panama and on the canal if this Government will devote $10,000,000 to the building of a railroad from a point on that canal to the city of Bogota.

I do not know whether there is a particle of foundation in that report, but if there is I do not think there is anything which this Government could do which would be more to the interest of the Government in connection with that enterprise than to do it, for two reasons.

In the first place, it would bring about that condition of friendly feeling which is so important, and, in the second place, it would really very largely add to the value of the canal when constructed to have such a railroad leading into a country filled with minerals and especially abounding in the coal which will be needed by the ships traversing the canal.

Mr. President, why should we hesitate or delay in inaugurating these negotiations for a settlement so consonant with justice and with our professions of a century and so important to our future interests? Delay is fruitful of evil. Each day adds to the ill feeling of the Colombians. The seeds of popular prejudice and hate, when they once germinate in a national soil, are most difficult of eradication.

Do we delay because the great United States are too proud, too vainglorious, to offer conciliation to a feeble people powerless to cope with it? I am sure, sir, that this is not the wish of the American people, but that, on the contrary, it is their wish that examination be made and that whatever is due to Colombia from us shall be paid in liberal measure.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, I do not rise to make a speech in reply to the Senator from Georgia, but simply to suggest that if it is to be the understood policy of the United States that whenever another country makes a claim against us, or whenever there is a controversy between us and another country, in which we do not acknowledge the ground of the claim or that we have done any wrong, we are to buy our peace at the rate of $10,000,000 or more, we shall have plenty of claims made against the country and plenty of controversies on our hands.

Mr. CULLOM. Are there any in sight? I should like to have the Senator state whether he knows of any movement already in reference to claims of that sort.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. We shall hear from them. If, admitting that we have done no wrong to Colombia, we buy our peace of her for the sum of $10,000,000 we shall hear of claims, and hear of them again from Colombia. If when we have done no wrong and if when we do not for a moment admit the justice of her claim, we put ourselves in the position of saying we will pay $10,000,000 rather than have any trouble with you, she will be able in six months' time to have another claim and another controversy with us; and so with other nations. This bill would make us enter on an interminable policy of buying our peace whenever any other nation concludes to make a claim against us.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, February 1, 1904, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate January 29, 1904.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 29, 1904.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty and most merciful God, our Heavenly Father, we thank Thee for the good, the pure, the true, the noble whom Thou has raised up in every age of the world's history to be leaders among men, the trend of whose lives have ever been toward the ideal. So we thank Thee, Heavenly Father, for the beautiful character of our beloved McKinley, whom we remember with grateful hearts to-day for the things that he did, and for the example of Christian character and fortitude he left to us in his life and death. So move, we beseech Thee, upon the hearts of Thy children that truth and righteousness and good will shall reign everywhere, in and through the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read.

CORRECTION.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Speaker, on January 21 I introduced a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States of America to keep its land always equally divided among all its people. I introduced that resolution by request and had no personal responsibility for it. This morning I was shown an editorial in the New York Sun, in which, among other things, criticising the resolution, it says: "Mr. THAYER takes full responsibility for his resolution and does not label it 'by request.'"

I at once undertook to write a letter to the New York Sun, dictating it to my secretary, when he said: "Mr. THAYER, I saw the printed resolution, and it did not say upon it that it was introduced by request." Whereupon I came to the House and found the resolution already printed and that it was in keeping with the assertion of the New York Sun in its editorial that it was not done by request.

When the resolution was presented to me I went to the file clerk's office, three of the clerks of whom are sitting here now and will bear testimony to the truth of what I am saying, and asked what was a Representative to do when asked to introduce a bill or resolution that he did not wish to be responsible for—what was the proper thing to do? I was told by them that they did not know what the custom was, but when a resolution was introduced if the Member stated it was done by request that relieved him from personal responsibility. I took this precaution in introducing the resolution in order that my action might correspond to that of the regular custom. Now, Mr. Speaker, in justice to myself, and in justice as well to those who believe in the resolution, I ask that the resolutions as printed may be suppressed and that others may be printed in their stead in accordance with the fact and in accordance with the records of the House. This is apparently a mistake of the printer and not of those who keep the records in the House, as the books here show that the resolution was introduced by request.

The SPEAKER. The Journal seems to be correct. What is the gentleman's request?

Mr. THAYER. That the resolutions already printed be suppressed and that others be printed in their stead, containing a record of the fact.

Mr. PAYNE. Did the gentleman write the words on the back of the resolution that it was introduced by request?

Mr. THAYER. I did; and I hold the original resolution in my hand with those words indorsed thereon.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the printed bills in existence will be suppressed, so far as it relates to the House document room, and a new print will be ordered in accordance with the gentleman's suggestion. The Chair hears no objection.

The Journal was then approved.

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the urgent deficiency bill.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. TAWNEY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10954, the urgent deficiency appropriation bill. General debate having been exhausted, the Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

For expenses of the Commission on International Exchange, appointed under the provisions of the sundry civil act of March 3, 1903, to bring about a fixed relationship between gold-standard and silver-using countries, $100,000.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a point of order against the provision just read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. That it is new legislation and has no authorization by any act of Congress and has never been considered by Congress. I make the point of order with the full expectation that it will be recognized, and, if it is, I do not care to take the time of the House in discussing it. I will ask the gentleman from Indiana, in charge of the bill, if he does not recognize the fact that the point of order is well taken?

Mr. HEMENWAY. No; Mr. Chairman, I insist that it is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state that this matter has never been before Congress in any way, shape, or manner, except an item of $25,000 in the sundry civil bill of last year. I call the attention of the Chairman to repeated decisions by the chairmen of committees in this House that such an item inserted in an appropriation bill in one year does not constitute an authority in such a way as to permit it in the shape of new legislation to be put on another appropriation bill. I call the attention of the Chairman especially to page 346 of the Digest, which reads:

An appropriation for an object in an annual appropriation bill makes law only for that year, and does not become "existing law" to justify a continuance of the appropriation.

That would absolutely throw this item out of this bill. I also call attention of the chairman to page 349 of the Digest, relating to salaries, which reads as follows:

In the absence of a general law fixing the salary, the amount appropriated in the last appropriation bill has sometimes been held to be the legal salary, although in violation of the general rule that the appropriation bill makes law only for the year.

I call attention now to the next citation:

The mere appropriation for a salary does not thereby create an office, so as to justify appropriations in succeeding years.

I now call the attention of the chairman to the item itself to which I am referring, as found in the sundry civil bill of last year, and which reads as follows:

To enable the President to cooperate through diplomatic channels with the Governments of Mexico, China, Japan, and other countries for the purpose set forth in the message of the President and accompanying notes submitted to Congress January 29, 1903, and printed as Senate Document No. 119, second session Fifty-seventh Congress, $25,000.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there was absolutely no authority whatever for that appropriation at that time. It never was in the House in any way, shape, or manner prior to its being put onto this bill as an amendment by the Senate. It was not only in violation of the rules of this House, but it was in violation of the rules of the Senate itself.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Connecticut inform the Chair the page on which the original law authorizing this commission is to be found?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I will take great pleasure in submitting the law itself to the Chair. That amendment never was in this House. It was not an original item in the sundry civil bill last year. It was an amendment put on of $100,000 in the Senate, in violation of its own rules as well as in violation of the rules of the House, and came over here when the bill was brought back from the Senate. It was reduced in conference from $100,000 to $25,000, and I think I may say, and that I knew at the time, that that was to be the end of that proposition. The $25,000 inserted in violation of the rules in both bodies last year, it is now claimed becomes an authorization for all future time.

Mr. PAYNE. May I ask the gentleman a question? What difference does it make whether it was against the rules or not, if it became a law finally?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. It makes no difference as a legal proposition, I suppose, but it makes a very great difference in another way, and it seems to me it is time that the House of Representatives asserted its own dignity and began to put a stop to that kind of procedure.

Mr. PAYNE. The House can not prescribe rules for the Senate. I wish it could.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Now, Mr. Chairman, I make this claim, that the appropriation, as inserted in the sundry civil bill last year, without any previous authorization, terminated with that appropriation, in accordance with decisions made over and over again, and that putting it on here in a new appropriation bill is new legislation, and that point of order has been sustained over and over again by past decisions of the House.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, this question substantially was determined the other day in respect to an item on the army appropriation bill, where, by amendment of the Senate, $400,000 was appropriated for the construction of a building at Washington Barracks. I made the point of order that its not being authorized by law, an additional appropriation for that work was not in order, and that the fixing of $400,000 in the bill was a limit, and that no appropriation in addition to the $100,000 could be made. The item went upon the bill just exactly as this item went upon the sundry civil bill in the last Congress. It was a Senate amendment, which was agreed to in conference, and of course passed the House, as all of the provisions have to pass the House before they become law.

The Chair then held that, being a public work in progress, the item of $300,000 on the army appropriation bill was in order. I think the Chair was correct in that holding. Here is a provision of law:

To enable the President to cooperate through diplomatic channels with the Governments of Mexico, China, Japan, and other countries, for the purpose set forth in the message of the President and accompanying notes, submitted to Congress January 29, 1903, and printed as Senate Document No. 119, second session, Fifty-seventh Congress, $25,000.

There is authority authorizing this appropriation and authorizing the Government to enter upon this public work—to wit, the bringing about through diplomatic channels and otherwise certain agreements with Mexico, China, and Japan. Now, that work is in progress. A Commission has been appointed. That Commission is now at work under authority of this law.

On this bill we report a provision for $100,000 more of appropriation to continue this work which is now in progress, and which was authorized by law passed in the last session of the Fifty-seventh Congress. It is exactly the case which was decided by the Chair five or six days ago, where I contended on the other side of the proposition that where an appropriation of $400,000 was made the work was limited to the $400,000. The Chair held I was not right in my contention and that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] was right in his, and that that being a public work in progress the additional appropriation could be made. It is exactly the same case, and I have no doubt the Chair will rule in the same way.

Mr. LIND. Will the gentleman permit me a question? Do I understand the tenor of his argument to be that our Government is committed to the proposition of international bimetallism?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Oh, not at all.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. That is the effect of it.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Oh, no; there is absolutely nothing in this provision that gives anybody the right to commit the Government to any proposition. Congress alone can commit the Government.

Mr. LIND. There is no law authorizing it?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Here is the law:

To enable the President——

Mr. LIND. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I hope the gentleman will allow me to answer the one he has already submitted.

To enable the President to cooperate through diplomatic channels with the Governments of Mexico, China, Japan, and other countries for the purpose set forth in the message of the President and accompanying notes submitted to Congress January 29, 1903, and printed as Senate Document No. 119, second session Fifty-seventh Congress, $25,000.

Now, as I understand that provision, it authorized the President to appoint a commission to try to bring about a fixed rate of exchange between Mexico, China, Japan, and other countries and the United States——

Mr. LIND. A fixed rate of exchange for gold and silver.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Giving to that Commission no power in any shape or manner to commit the Government, but simply to try to bring about some arrangement which should afterwards be submitted for approval to the Congress of the United States and to the legislative body of the country or countries joining in the agreement.

Mr. LIND. Then does not the gentleman contend that the point of order is not well taken, because this Government by prior legislation is committed to the proposition of securing stability of international exchange as to gold and silver?

Mr. HEMENWAY. The Government is not committed to it in any way. We are simply trying to bring about, through our diplomatic corps and through this Commission, fixed rates of exchange. When such an agreement has been brought about by negotiation, then Congress will have to legislate upon the question. The Government can only be committed by legislation—not by any agreement which this Commission may be able to arrive at with other countries.

Mr. LIND. The question to which I desire to get a specific answer is this: If, as I understand, existing law commits the Government to these negotiations, then the point of order is not well taken. If it does not, the point of order is well taken, it seems to me.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I do not think the gentleman is correct in his statement. Of course, the Government will not be committed to any agreement made by this Commission. The object of the Commission is to bring about fixed rates of exchange between this country and other countries. For instance, in the dealings between citizens of this country and citizens of Mexico—I may not be exactly accurate, but I understand the fact to be that the price of exchange in Mexico ranged last year from about $2.16 to $2.85.

So a merchant in Mexico buying, we will say, an engine and a boiler from some manufacturer in the United States to-day contracts to have the engine and boiler delivered sixty days from now. It may be that exchange to-day is $2.20, but on the day of the delivery of that machinery it may have run up to $2.50. There is no fixed basis on which business can be done as between the two countries.

Now, this Commission hopes to bring about a fixed rate of exchange, so that when the Mexican merchant undertakes to deal with a merchant of the United States he will know on what basis payment is to be made. Whether or not such an arrangement can be brought about between this country and Mexico, China, Japan, and others, is a great question. It can not be solved in a day or a year. It means long diplomatic negotiations between the different countries. But if it can be brought about all agree it would be of great benefit to the United States.

Now, it is proposed to continue the services of this Commission that is trying to bring about that condition of affairs, and when they have progressed to such a point that they think they have something to report to Congress they will make report, and we shall have the opportunity to determine whether we are willing to commit the Government to any scheme which the Commission may suggest.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I should be glad to be heard a moment on the point of order, directly. I simply wish to call the attention of the Chair to the history of the legislation for which this particular item seeks to make provision by an additional appropriation. In the latter days of December, 1902, or, perhaps, the early days of January, 1903, the Chinese and Mexican Governments——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will suspend until order is restored. The Committee of the Whole will come to order. [A pause.] The gentleman will now proceed.

Mr. OVERSTREET. It is not my purpose, Mr. Chairman, to address myself to the merits of this item, but directly to the question of order which is raised, and in doing so to call the attention of the Chair briefly to the history of the legislation relating to this subject, which, I believe, throws some material light on the solution of the point of order.

In January, 1903, the Mexican and Chinese Governments, through their accredited representatives to the United States, made written request of the President of the United States for some plan through which the three Governments might cooperate in arriving at a system of international exchange for the benefit of the merchants of gold-standard countries dealing with countries which used silver. Those communications were, through the Secretary of State, made to the President, and on the 29th day of January, 1903, by message to Congress, addressed to both Houses thereof, the President called that proposition to the attention of Congress and asked for legislation which would enable him to put in operation some such plan. In his message of January 29 he used this language:

I recommend that the Executive be given sufficient powers to lend the support of the United States in such manner and to such degree as he may deem expedient to the purposes of the two Governments.

Those purposes I briefly referred to. In keeping with that request and recommendation of the Executive, the Congress, on the 3d of March, enacted into law on the sundry civil bill the item giving that power, carrying with it an appropriation of $25,000, to the President.

Acting under that law the President designated a commission of three men, and through his Secretary of State gave instructions to them, and by those instructions they are to-day bound. They have no other power, in law or equity, to bind this Government to any proposition, but under the law under which they are operating must report back through the Executive to the Congress. That Commission has pursued its order of business under those instructions and has made report through the President to the Congress, and at this session the President transmitted that report to the Congress, with a message recommending the further appropriation provided for in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Indiana permit the Chair to ask him a question?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair takes it that the gentleman will not contend that this item can be sustained under any other rule than that relating to public works and objects already in progress.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I was going to say, Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Now, does the gentleman consider, under the rulings of the Chair heretofore, that this is a public work or object such as is contemplated by the rule allowing appropriations of this kind?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I certainly believe that it does come within that, and I was just upon the point of stating to the Chair that this very Commission, carrying out the instructions given it through the Secretary of State, is now at work. It is a continuing project, and this item of appropriation is to provide for that continuance by an additional appropriation.

All of this, Mr. Chairman, is a part of the records of this body. Every step of its progress has been made public through the messages of the President, and the last one I refer to is the one in which he refers specifically to this very item, stating in that message the necessity and importance of continuing this project or investigation, because they have only begun in the first investigation by visits to European capitals, and are now progressing with their work at the Japanese and Chinese courts. It comes directly within the purview of the authority of this House, shown by its rules, where a project has been authorized the necessity of its continuance has been demonstrated, and the importance of an additional appropriation made plain in order to complete it. I think the point of order is not well taken, for the very reason referred to by the Chair, that it is a project not yet completed, which has already been authorized and for which a partial provision of expenditure has been made.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to discuss the merits of the proposition. I am ready to make a proposition to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. I distinctly tried to avoid discussing the merits of this bill. The gentlemen on the other side have now taken about half an hour, referring largely to the merits of the bill. The gentleman from Indiana in discussing the point of order has referred to the history of the matter. Well, it depends a good deal on who writes history. I will give a history of this thing entirely different from that which the gentleman from Indiana has given, and will submit the whole facts to the House, if that becomes necessary. I do not want to do it. I am perfectly willing to leave this matter on the point of order right now with the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, with the understanding that if his decision is against the point of order, I shall have the same amount of time that the gentlemen have already taken to discuss the merits of the proposition on an amendment that I shall offer.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Very well; I am ready to submit the point of order without another word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to call to the attention of the committee the language of this paragraph against which the point of order has been made; for it seems to the Chair from that language that the appropriation is not in continuation of such a public work or object in progress as the second clause of Rule XXI contemplates:

For expenses of the Commission on International Exchange, appointed under the provisions of the sundry civil act of March 3, 1903, to bring about a fixed relationship between gold-standard and silver-using countries, $100,000.

The paragraph does not state specifically what these expenses are; but in view of the language of the act, which the Chair has before it, creating or authorizing the President to create the Commission referred to, it is reasonable to infer that this appropriation is for the payment of salaries and other expenses of employees of the Government—that is, employees at large, as contradistinguished from employees of the Departments, and duties, too, that are not defined by law. In the opinion of the Chair it is difficult to see how the paragraph can be sustained under the provision of Rule XXI, to which the Chair has referred. That rule reads as follows:

No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress.

The question is whether this Commission, the purpose of its creation and the continuation of its duties, is such a public object already in progress as this rule intends. On this question the uniform ruling or holding of previous Chairmen has been that public works or objects already in progress authorizing appropriations not provided for by law had to be of a tangible, substantial nature, like the erection of buildings, construction of roads, etc.

The Chair finds in the Book of Precedents a decision on a very similar state of facts; the decision was made by Mr. Payson, of Illinois, who then occupied the chair:

On April 25, 1890, the House was in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, considering the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The Clerk having read the paragraph relating to salaries in the Interior Department, Mr. Joseph D. Sayers, of Texas, made a point of order that there was a provision for nine members of a Board of Pension Appeals, to be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, at a salary of $2,000 each, whereas the law constituting the Board provided for three members only.

After debate, on the succeeding day the Chairman gave his ruling. He said that legislation of like character had been adopted on the bill for the past five years, but it appeared from the RECORD that no point of order was urged against the provision. The existing law was found in the Revised Statutes, pages 26 and 27. "Four classes of clerks and three salaries are provided for," continued the Chairman.

After reciting the law providing for a less number on the Board of Pension Appeals, the Chair said:

If this provision is properly in this bill at all, the point of order being raised against it, it must be, in the judgment of the Chair, because it is connected with an "object already in progress" under the statutes of the United States. Now, it is urged in behalf of those opposing the point of order that because an appeal is allowed from the Commissioner of Pensions to the Secretary of the Interior, and because it is a physical impossibility for the Secretary of the Interior to personally perform all of the duties devolving upon the office he holds, and because it has been thought advantageous, in the performance of the duties devolving upon the head of that Department, to render the assistance in the direction indicated by this provision by a board of pension appeals in his office, as a part of the executive force of the office, that therefore it is one of the "objects" contemplated by the rule "as already in progress." The Chair was inclined to think, on the adjournment of the House yesterday, that that point was well taken; but upon consideration, and upon such reflection as the Chair has been able to give to the matter later, the Chair is inclined to think that it can not be so held.

The rule imposes this limitation on the power of the House as to legislation on appropriation bills: That no appropriations shall be made thereby for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless such proposed expenditure is in continuation of a public work or an object already in progress; that is, a public work or object previously authorized by statute and not yet completed.

"Public works" contemplated, in the judgment of the Chair, clearly contemplates tangible matters, as buildings, roads, and such other matters as readily suggest themselves.

So the question only remains, Does the expression "objects already in progress" include the duties to be performed by this board during the ensuing year? The Chair held it did not, and sustained the point of order.

This decision has been repeatedly cited and followed in like and similar cases, and since the provision against which the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] has made the point of order merely provides for continuing the duties of this Commission for another year, it does not, in the opinion of the Chair, appropriate for the continuation of such an "object already in progress" as the rule contemplates. Therefore the Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Secretary of State to mark the boundary, and make the surveys incidental thereto, between the Territory of Alaska and the Dominion of Canada in conformity with the award of the Alaskan Boundary Tribunal and existing treaties, $100,000, to remain available until the close of the fiscal year 1905.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order on the paragraph which has just been read, on the ground that it is new legislation.

Mr. HEMENWAY. If the Chair is in doubt, I want to be heard upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. To what part of the bill does the gentleman refer?

Mr. HAY. Page 2, beginning of line 9.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to ask the gentleman from Virginia if he will cite to the Chair the law authorizing this Commission?

Mr. HAY. I can not hear the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to know if the gentleman from Virginia can cite to the Chair the law authorizing the Commission appointed for the purpose of fixing the boundary line between Alaska and the United States?

Mr. HAY. No; I can not. I do not know of any such law.

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair, there was some legislative authority for the existence of the Commission that has settled the boundary question between the United States and Great Britain in respect to the boundary between the United States and Alaska.

Mr. HAY. That was a treaty; there was not a law, as I understand it. The point I make is——

Mr. HEMENWAY. I suggest to the Chair that a treaty is about the highest law known.

Mr. HAY. I submit to the Chair that this is entirely new; there is no law heretofore, and it is certainly not in order upon an urgent deficiency bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that this appropriation, which is to defray the expense of marking the boundary and making the necessary surveys between the Territory of Alaska and the Dominion of Canada, is in continuation of a tangible public work already begun. The Commission was created by authority of law for the purpose of defining that boundary line in accordance with a treaty between the United States and Great Britain, and an appropriation was made for the purpose of ascertaining the exact boundary. Volume 32, page 1138, Statutes at Large, provides for or authorizes the beginning of the work of marking this boundary. The paragraph against which the gentleman has made the point of order is in continuation of that public work which is to mark the boundary line as ascertained by the Commission, and the Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Consular service in Manchuria: For the balance of the fiscal year 1904: Consul-general at Mukden, Manchuria, at the rate of $4,000 per annum; consul at An-tung, Manchuria, at the rate of $4,000 per annum; in all, $3,318.68, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend page 4, in line 21, by striking out the words "four thousand," before the word "dollars," and insert in lieu thereof the words "three thousand five hundred;" so it will read "$3,500."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers the following amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 21 strike out the words "four thousand" and insert "three thousand five hundred."

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, we have no objection to the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. HITT. This is done in order to make the two consulates of similar salary by reducing this one, the Committee on Foreign Affairs having fixed that salary permanently, to begin in the next fiscal year, at $3,500, and it ought not to be $4,000 here.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair calls the attention of the gentleman from Illinois to the fact that the total will have to be changed.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I ask unanimous consent that the total be corrected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the total be corrected in accordance with the amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Office of the Secretary: For two clerks of class 4, to be engaged during the remainder of the fiscal year 1904 in revising the customs regulations, $1,496.82, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order on that paragraph that it creates or authorizes the employment of two new clerks.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I do not care to discuss it; but I simply call the attention of the Chair to the fact that I think if the Chair will read section 161 of the Revised Statutes he will see that it authorizes Congress to provide from time to time such number of clerks as they think necessary for the proper conduct of the business of the Government, and from time to time the Chair has held that items of this kind are in order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand that the Revised Statutes provide and authorize the employment of clerks?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Why, certainly; such number of clerks as Congress shall provide from time to time for the public service.

The CHAIRMAN. To what section of the Revised Statutes does the gentleman refer?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I think it is section 161. If we are mistaken about that we will look it up.

Mr. HAY. That objection does not meet the rule of the House. Congress has not provided for these two clerks. It is now providing for the clerks and appropriating for them, and no such expenditure has been previously authorized by law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair finds, upon examining the Revised Statutes, that it is section 169 instead of 161 that authorizes this appropriation. The section reads as follows:

The head of a Department is authorized to employ in his Department such number of clerks of the several classes recognized by law and such messengers, assistant messengers, copyists, watchmen, laborers, and other employees, and at such rates of compensation, respectively, as may be appropriated for by Congress from year to year.

Now, in the opinion of the Chair, this statute authorizes the employment of the clerks provided for in this paragraph, against which the gentleman from Virginia has made the point of order. These clerks are described as "clerks of class 4;" and that being one of the classes recognized by law, the point of order is overruled.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, do I understand the Chair to say that under that ruling the various heads of Departments have the right to employ any number of clerks they choose and that Congress will therefore be obliged to appropriate for them?

The CHAIRMAN. No; that is not the ruling of the Chair. The appropriation must precede the appointment, and the Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Office of Auditor for the Post-Office Department: For twenty-five skilled laborers, at the rate of $720 per annum each, for the balance of the fiscal year 1904, $7,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations why the twenty-five skilled laborers are provided for in this bill, whether or not they have been heretofore appropriated for, and why they are needed at this particular time?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I will say to the gentleman from Virginia that the work of the Post-Office Department is behind, and call his attention to page 14 of the hearings. He will see that in order to bring the work up these clerks are provided for. On the legislative bill a number are provided for, quite a number more than are provided for here.

Mr. HAY. They are skilled workmen?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Skilled laborers to count the money orders, of which there are about 500 pounds a day, that come in and have to be sorted out. It is done by skilled laborers much cheaper than it could be done by clerks, and these are provided for in this bill, so that the work can be brought up.

Mr. HAY. I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

The President is hereby authorized to establish convenient districts for the collection of revenue from customs, and for that purpose may subdivide any State or Territory within or appurtenant to the United States, or may unite two or more States or Territories within or appurtenant to the United States, or any part or parts thereof, into one district, and may, from time to time, alter said districts: Provided, That there shall be no more than 123 collection districts.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the paragraph commencing at line 14 on page 13, and ending with line 22, that it is new legislation, and, in my judgment, not very wise legislation, or in the interest of economy. It changes existing law, and not only one existing law, but a good many existing laws.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask if the point of order was made to the whole paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Maine to make the point of order to that part of the bill on page 13, from line 14 to 22, inclusive.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Yes; to the whole paragraph.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, while I believe the paragraph, if enacted into law, would bring about a great reform, resulting in great saving of money to the Government, I have no doubt that the point of order is well taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order made by the gentleman from Maine is sustained.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Now, Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 13 insert the following:

"The President is authorized to inquire and report to Congress, at the beginning of its next session, what reorganization and consolidation of existing districts for the collection of revenue from customs can and should be made, so as to reduce the same to not exceeding 123 in number; whether such reorganization and consolidation would be in the interest of better administration and reduction of expenditures; and if so, in what particulars and to what extent."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this proposed amendment is subject to the same rule; that it is a change of existing law and new legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I hope the gentleman will not make the point of order, as this only seeks information by which a great reform can be brought about.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. If I should withdraw the point of order, I think it would be renewed by some other gentleman.

Mr. HEMENWAY. It does not in any way bind Congress. It simply secures the information necessary by which the reform can be brought about.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, as I have said, if I withdraw the point of order, I have no doubt it will be renewed. This whole legislation is evidently a sweeping change in existing law.

Mr. HEMENWAY. There is no doubt but that the gentleman's point of order is well taken if he insists upon it; but I urge the fact that this will furnish information by which a great reform can be brought about and large sums of money saved to the Government.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. According to the gentleman's own statement in the RECORD a day or two ago, it will save the Government about $100,000 a year.

Mr. HEMENWAY. About a hundred and thirty-five thousand dollars each year.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Well, Mr. Chairman, the statement made in the RECORD was that it was about $100,000. Now, this is the initial step toward the abolition of a large number of customs districts from Maine to Florida and along the Pacific coast, and we think that this legislation is too sweeping upon an appropriation bill; that if it is desirable to reorganize, or take steps to do so, by this proposed inquiry, the custom-house districts, there ought to be a separate bill for that purpose.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I have this to say in reply to the chairman of the committee: He says this is a reform that is needed. Where is the proof? The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] well said the other day that the laws need overhauling; that there ought to be reform in the customs laws. But we should have a full hearing, proof, and a full report; then act.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The Secretary of the Treasury points out the condition, and estimates that $135,000 a year, I think it is, will be paid. It is very clear, if the gentleman will take the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, that in some instances we are paying as high as $600 for the collection of $1. If we can stop that, it will be a great reform.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Notwithstanding the Treasury report, it has not been called to the attention of the House until two days ago, when the gentleman from New York, whose committee—Ways and Means—has had charge of the customs laws, rose in this House and said that they ought to be overhauled.

Now, certainly an appropriation bill is not the place to overhaul general laws. If there should be a reformation in this matter, not simply information, then let it come in by general legislation, as is suggested by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. THOMAS] and as the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] wisely intimated to the distinguished chairman who reports this bill. Instead of that, we are undertaking a reformation here without any information about it. Why was not the particular matter referred to in the report of the Treasury referred to the Ways and Means Committee for that committee to report on it?

Mr. Chairman, I have no seaports in my district. This is simply a question of policy as to whether or not we should rip up our laws here all at once and get to be very frugal and penurious over saving the money in the Treasury on little matters and letting millions and millions of dollars slide through our hands here in appropriation bills, as we have for the last five or six years, without being challenged at all by gentlemen on the other side. I am for this reform, but let it come regularly, fully, completely, so we can see ourselves where we should use the pruning knife.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina withdraw his point of order?

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I do not think I ought to withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Supplies furnished destitute natives of Alaska during an epidemic in 1900: To pay amounts found due by the accounting officers of the Treasury under the provisions of the deficiency act of March 3, 1903, on account of supplies furnished to destitute natives of Alaska during an epidemic in the year 1900, as follows: Alaska Exploration Company, San Francisco, Cal., $33; Alaska Commercial Company, San Francisco, Cal., $25,328.15; North American Transportation and Trading Company, Seattle, Wash., $1,552.25; in all, $26,913.40.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee if the information called for in the proposed amendment which he submitted a few moments ago can not be furnished now by the President and officers of the Government.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Why, I suppose a resolution could be passed asking for the information, and I think if the chairman of the proper committee would make the request for information it could be secured in that way.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I should certainly think so.

Mr. COWHERD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman what was the authorization for the expenditure of this money by these companies—whether they were authorized to expend it in any bill; and, if so, how much.

Mr. HEMENWAY. As I remember it, at the last session of Congress the Senate put on an appropriation for these items by amendment; the Departments were instructed to ascertain what, if anything, was due from the Government to these different companies, and to have the amounts reported to Congress.

Mr. COWHERD. Due from the Government to those companies for assistance furnished the Indians? Or was it for supplies, or what was it?

Mr. HEMENWAY. They were furnished in the regular way, following the law, were sent down for payment, but there was some lack of information at the last session of Congress as to whether or not they were accurate.

Mr. COWHERD. What I am getting at and what I want to know is if there is any law now on the statute books providing for the furnishing of supplies to the destitute Indians in Alaska.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I think not. The gentleman will remember that this was the result of the famine which occurred up there some four years ago.

Mr. COWHERD. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman will remember—I don't know whether he will or not—that two or three of us attempted—I think when the last sundry civil bill was before the House—to have an amendment made to that bill, providing for an appropriation to furnish supplies to those Indians who at that time the evidence showed were dying by the thousands from famine. If I remember correctly, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY]—at least I am certain the chairman of the committee at that time—opposed the appropriation, and we were unable to get the relief we sought. I want to know now whether this is payment for that relief furnished without law?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I think these supplies were furnished prior to that time; but I will state that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations would still oppose legislation of that kind to permanently appropriate a sum for the care of those Indians. When it becomes absolutely necessary and there is danger of famine, they will be taken care of, and Congress will find a way to ascertain the amounts that ought to be paid. Here is the legislation under which these amounts are paid:

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and required to examine and adjust the accounts of the Alaska Commercial Company, the North American Transportation and Trading Company, and the Alaska Exploration Company for supplies furnished and services rendered to the sick, destitute, and starving natives of Alaska during an epidemic of disease over that country in the year 1900.

Now, under that legislation these amounts were ascertained and are now appropriated for, and I have no doubt if there is occasion in the future for aid up there it will be furnished; but I do not believe it to be good policy to put on an appropriation bill an annual sum, so that those people will depend upon receiving so much of Government aid each year of their lives and thereby quit trying to support themselves, because that has been the history of all such things.

Mr. COWHERD. But does the gentleman believe it is better to let these companies furnish such aid as they please in such places as they please rather than that it should be furnished through Government officers, if the Government in the end is to pay for it?

Mr. HEMENWAY. As the gentleman will see, this appropriation is not for deficiencies for the year 1904, but is to take care of an item for 1900. I understand there has been no difficulty of this kind since these supplies were furnished at that time.

Mr. COWHERD. On the contrary, if the gentleman will permit me, I will read from a report showing that 20 per cent of those people have died at that time from epidemic, without any assistance practically having been furnished from the Government.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Well, I do not——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. COWHERD. As long as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] has occupied most of my time, I ask an additional five minutes.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I hope it will be granted.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to allowing the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COWHERD] five minutes more? The Chair hears none.

Mr. COWHERD. I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana and of the House to the deplorable condition of the native people in certain portions of Alaska. We have gone there in search of gold and have absolutely changed the conditions that surrounded those people. Why, sir, we have passed game laws that have taken away from them their last hope of subsistence. Our game laws have even protected the ferocious bears in the mountainous country at the very time that we are attempting to stock that country with sheep and cattle, and by a Senate report we find those bears are so numerous that explorers have to defend themselves from their attacks. We have passed game laws to protect the bears and have left the Indians to die from starvation. We have passed game laws to protect the walrus, and we have made a closed season that prohibits the Indians from obtaining at the one time that he can obtain it what was formerly for them a great source of food supply. And these people are the only Indians in all the world that never raised their hands against the white man—the only Indians whose houses have been open to every stranger that came knocking at the door.

These are Indians who, the Government officers say, have absolutely deprived their families of the means of subsistence in order to feed the white man. These Indians we are leaving to die there from epidemic and starvation, in order to protect the game of the country for the casual hunter that may come there.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that this is a blotch upon the legislation of the country—it is a reproach upon the humanity of our legislation that we sit here and permit it. I submit it would be much better for our own race, as well for the Indians, that we should legislate to preserve the Indian rather than to preserve the game, and I remember when this legislation was before the House we were told that the purpose of the law was to preserve the game for the Indian and not from him.

We are spending millions of dollars in introducing civilization, as we say, to the people out yonder in the Philippines, thousands of miles, and getting back little or nothing in return. Here is a piece of territory from which we are drawing millions of dollars in gold production; yet we are refusing year after year to furnish the Government officers there with the pittance which would enable them to take care of this last remnant of a most interesting people—a people, too, who, as reports show, have always extended to us the utmost friendliness and who to-day are perishing from the face of the earth because of the conditions that we have thrown around them.

Let me read you from a report made by a Senate committee that has investigated this subject:

They are hunters by nature and habit, and before the influx of the whites were able and willing to care for themselves, but through the game laws they are wholly deprived of their chief means of maintenance. Why they should be deprived of their immemorial right to hunt at will passes the comprehension of the committee. In a territory so vast as that of Alaska, many sections of which have never been trodden by the foot of a white man, where the mountains are lofty, rugged, inaccessible, and almost impenetrable, it is folly to claim that danger of extermination or even depletion of the amount of valuable game exists at the hands of the natives.

The sea lion and the walrus are protected by their natural habitat from danger of extermination at their hands. The decrease in the number of walrus has come through their systematic slaughter by whalers, who, having failed to secure enough monsters of the deep, at one time sought the walrus for their oil. The Kodiak bear is found on Kodiak Island and on the mainland from the southern coast to the far north. They are protected by innumerable mountains not yet explored. They are large, savage, and so numerous that explorers have to defend themselves against attacks. Why they should be protected against either whites or natives is not apparent, particularly in view of the fact that attempts are being made to stock Kodiak Island with sheep and cattle, 10,000 of the former and 200 of the latter having been placed there during the last two years.

The deplorable condition of these classes is such as to demand other and further relief at the hands of Congress. Their care, oversight, and whatever assistance may be required should be assumed at once. In the opinion of the committee the Secretary of the Interior should be authorized to appoint as many agents as may be found necessary to inquire into their conditions and needs and to administer relief. Appropriations should be made for this purpose.

The business of Alaska is carried on by citizens of the United States. It is claimed by them to now be a "white man's country." To all intents and purposes such is the fact. In every contest for gain the white man has been the gainer. Poverty, extreme and pitiful, prevails among these classes and develops their tendency to disease. Death is ever present at their doors. Justice and humanity alike demand legislation for their relief.

They say in this report—I think this was two or three years ago—that 30 per cent of those people have died from starvation and from an epidemic of measles that appeared amongst them.

We may not be able to remedy this condition of things at the present time; but I am seeking to call the attention of the chairman of this great committee to this important subject that he may investigate it, and that something may be done for those people in the regular appropriation bill—done through the officers of the Government and in proper channels—not by making appropriations to these companies after famine and pestilence have destroyed the race.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HEMENWAY. I suggest to the gentleman that the Committee on Appropriations has no jurisdiction and has nothing to do with the question. The question belongs to the Committee on Territories, and if the gentleman believes there ought to be legislation it should be presented through the Committee on Territories.

Mr. COWHERD. Has not the Committee on Appropriations in the sundry civil bill carried an item——

Mr. HEMENWAY. We have carried an item for reindeer—I think an item of $25,000—that has resulted in great benefit to those people; but the gentleman knows that the minute you go to issuing rations to the Indians in Alaska or in the United States or anywhere else you make paupers of them. They immediately begin to wait for the rations to come around in place of going ahead to try to make their own living. In addition to that they have a local government recently provided by Congress, by which they collect their own taxes as you collect yours in Missouri, and they ought to take care of their poor people through their local funds. But in any event the Committee on Appropriations has nothing whatever to do with this item, and it belongs to the Committee on Territories.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Owners of British steamship Mogul: To pay the amount found due by the accounting officers of the Treasury, under the provisions of the deficiency act of March 3, 1903, to Gallatly, Hankey & Co., of London, England, owners of the British steamship Mogul, for damages by reason of the collision between said steamship and the United States transport Warren, in Manila Bay, December 30, 1900, $15,303.07.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to reserve the point of order under the item just read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That it is legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say that on page 1048 of the Statutes at Large, volume 32, is found the following provision:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to examine the claim of Messrs. Gallatly, Hankey & Co., of London, England, owners of the British steamship Mogul, for damages alleged to be due said owners by reason of the collision between said steamship Mogul and the United States transport Warren in Manila Bay on December 30, 1900, and determine what damages, if any, are due thereby to said owners of said steamship Mogul, and to certify the amount of such damages, if any are found to be due, to the Secretary of the Treasury; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to report the same to Congress for its action.

Thus it has been held to be a special auditing authorized by law, and the appropriation of money for the purpose of paying the amount found to be due is in order under the Rules of the House. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I submit that it is no deficiency in any sense, but that the Secretary was merely authorized to ascertain and report upon a claim. This is an item to pay a specific sum.

The CHAIRMAN. In reply to the gentleman from New York the Chair will read from the Manual:

It is in order to provide on an appropriation bill, as a deficiency, for the payment of an account audited under authority of law.

This account was audited under express authority of law, and is clearly in order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, then I move to strike out the item.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves to strike out the paragraph just read.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do that, Mr. Chairman, for this reason: There have been a number of claims of this character made against the Government of the United States, some by citizens of the United States and some by citizens of other nations, and it has been the unvarying practice to compel the claimants to submit their claims to the Committee on Claims of this House, so that by legislation some court might pass upon the question of negligence, and if negligence on the part of Government officials was found, then to have the court pass upon the question of damages. Here we simply have some executive officer of one of the Departments reporting to Congress that in the opinion of that Department this collision in Manila Bay was due to the negligence of servants of the United States, and that the damage occasioned by that collision amounted to so much money.

It seems to me that there should be a uniform practice in these cases. I recollect well that a constituent of mine was compelled to submit its claim, arising out of a collision between one of the war vessels of the United States and a vessel having passengers on board, in the East River, in New York, to the district court of the United States sitting as a court of admiralty; and I say that if the Government is to recognize a claim of this sort at all, that is the proper way to do it. I am utterly opposed to giving to executive officers either the powers or duties that properly devolve upon the Congress, or to constitute them as courts to pass upon claims of this character, and I believe that this claimant, like all other claimants, should be relegated to the remedy given to citizens of the United States and citizens of other countries in the past.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Refund of duties to North American Transportation and Trading Company: To refund to the North American Transportation and Trading Company, of Seattle, Wash., the sum of $1,075, being the amount of duties unlawfully collected from said company on account of cost of repairs of the barge New York, it appearing that said vessel was not enrolled and licensed under the laws of the United States within the meaning of section 3114 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. OLMSTED. Reserving the point of order, I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations why this appropriation should be made in this bill and this claim not sent, like other claims of like character, to the Committee on Claims for proper action?

Mr. HEMENWAY. It is to refund the amount found due this company; and of course it does not go to the Committee on Claims, because the amount has been ascertained, and it is agreed by the Government that this amount of money was collected from this company in violation of law.

Mr. OLMSTED. Under what particular law and by what officer has that finding of fact been made?

Mr. HEMENWAY. The Secretary of the Treasury is the officer.

Mr. OLMSTED. Where has the Secretary reported it?

Mr. HEMENWAY. He reports it down in a document which comes to Congress here, recommending that the amount be appropriated.

Mr. OLMSTED. There is nothing in the paragraph that indicates that the amount has been passed upon by any officer of the Government.

Mr. HEMENWAY. This is an account that has been passed on. It has been audited by the Secretary of the Treasury and certified down for appropriation. I can find the document after a while.

Mr. OLMSTED. Then, assuming that to be the case, there is hardly a Member upon this floor who has not constituents who have some equally just claim upon the Government, but they can not get them in these general appropriation bills.

Mr. HEMENWAY. This class of claims is always paid in appropriation bills. Here it is:

To refund to the North American Transportation and Trading Company, of Seattle, Wash., the sum of $1,075, being the amount of duties unlawfully collected from said company on account of cost of repairs of the barge New York, it appearing that said vessel was not enrolled and licensed under the laws of the United States within the meaning of section 3114 of the Revised Statutes.

This is one of the class of claims that is always paid in this bill.

Mr. OLMSTED. What did you read from?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I read from the estimates submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It took me three years or more to get through a similar claim for a constituent, where the duties had been paid and where the United States Supreme Court decided they were illegally collected; and I could not get that claim put in an appropriation bill.

Mr. HEMENWAY. If the gentleman had got his claim properly allowed and certified down to us for an appropriation, it would have been carried in this bill. Nearly every bill of this kind carries quite a number of these claims.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This went through in a private bill, and it had superior merit or it would not have gone through.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I do not know anything of the form under which the gentleman's claim comes, but in these the Secretary of the Treasury certifies the ascertained amount illegally collected from this company, and he certifies the amount down for appropriation.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, upon the statement of the gentleman from Indiana, that this account has been adjudicated by the Treasury Department and payment recommended by the Department, I will make no point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Payment to the Pacific Coast Steamship Company: To pay the account of the Pacific Coast Steamship Company for damages to their steamer Ramona, caused by collision with the United States revenue steamer McCulloch off Martinez, Cal., April 28, 1903, $50.13.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that paragraph. I do not think that this claim, which is nothing more than a claim upon the Government, is of any higher class than thousands of claims pending before Congress and I do not think we ought to pay the claim of a great steamship company while we are not ready to pay these smaller claimants whose claims are just as good. I make the point of order that that paragraph is in violation of clause 2 of Rule XXI.

Mr. HEMENWAY. If the Chair is in doubt that this is authorized by law——

The CHAIRMAN. If it has been adjudicated by the Department the Chair has no doubt that the item is under authority of law.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The law authorizes it and provides that in cases of this kind a board shall be convened to investigate the matter. Under that law the board has been convened. This item has been investigated. It found that the United States was at fault, that the United States revenue cutter McCulloch was at fault in this collision, and the board takes up the matter under the law and assesses the damage and reports it to Congress, and Congress appropriates under the law.

The CHAIRMAN. Has this claim been adjudicated under that law?

Mr. HEMENWAY. It has been adjudicated. The board convened and certified it for appropriation.

Mr. OLMSTED. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee—the gentleman from Indiana—in what better position does this claim stand than the claims of my constituents for damages sustained at the hands of the Army when they occupied Fort Meade, near Harrisburg? The claims were passed upon by the War Department and recommended to Congress, but we had to get special authority to pay them.

If my friend can point me to any authority of law for the payment of this claim I will be glad to withdraw the point of order.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The authority is this: That the statutes authorize and direct and require, in every case of collision, that this board be convened, that an investigation be held, that after the investigation has been held that they certify the amount of damages, if any, and whether or not the United States is liable; and when that is done and the amount fixed and audited it goes through the proper Department and is certified down here under the law for appropriation; the difference being in this class of claims and the class of claims suggested by the gentleman that there is no statute for that class of claims suggested by the gentleman authorizing this procedure, while in this case there is a statute authorizing and directing how these amounts shall be ascertained.

Mr. OLMSTED. Well, I will say that in the case to which I referred there was especial authority of law by statute for an investigation by the War Department and an ascertainment of the amount justly due by the Government to those parties, but after that was had there had to be authorization of law before the money could be appropriated to pay them the money. Some of them have not been paid yet.

Mr. MAHON. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. OLMSTED. Certainly.

Mr. MAHON. Under the general law all claims which are war claims and are adjudicated by the Treasury Department are, under the rule, sent to the Committee on War Claims, where they are appropriated for and paid. This is not a claim for damages in time of war. This action probably happened in time of peace, and therefore it came properly to the Committee on Appropriations. I simply suggest this to the gentleman who complains that he did not get this kind of a bill passed to introduce the legislation and you will know next time what corner to turn to get it acted upon.

Mr. OLMSTED. I was not finding any fault with the Committee on War Claims. The Camp Meade claims, so far as paid, were paid upon a bill coming through the Committee on War Claims, a regular bill for the payment of the claims; but this kind of a claim would go before the Committee on Claims—not War Claims, but Claims—and there are plenty of bills there now. I had one myself reported from that committee last year for the refund of money for revenue stamps collected improperly from a dealer in tobacco, but it required special authority of Congress to repay that money, and unless the gentleman from Indiana can point to some statute authorizing this appropriation I shall insist upon my point of order. If he shows me the statute I shall be glad to withdraw it, as of course it can not stand.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Does the gentleman contend that this is not authorized by law? I think I can find the statute in a minute or two.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Indiana to say that the adjudication of these claims has been by authority of law.

Mr. HEMENWAY. There is no doubt about it.

The CHAIRMAN (continuing). And it has been held repeatedly that the adjudication authorizes an appropriation for the payment of the amount adjudicated or found to be due parties in those special cases. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that there is no law authorizing this. The item has been audited under a special provision of the deficiency act last year and there is no general law authorizing the auditing of these claims.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Indiana to read the law——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I suggest that the gentleman from Indiana did not read any law. He stated on general authority what he believes the law to be, but there is no such provision of law upon the books.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Does the gentleman make the statement that there is no such general statute authorizing this?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Unquestionably.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Well, we will find it.

Mr. MAHON. Regular order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Centerville, Iowa, post-office: For completion of building under present limit, $16,250.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to inquire from the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations why this bill does not carry an appropriation for the purchase of the site for the new post-office in the city of New York, as heretofore recommended by the commission appointed for that purpose?

Mr. HEMENWAY. No recommendation has come to the committee coming from a Department.

Mr. SULZER. As I understand it, Congress heretofore passed a law for a commission to select a suitable site for the New York City post-office—a commission consisting of the Postmaster-General, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Attorney-General. And the law provided that they should select the location in New York City, and make a report to Congress as to the cost of the same, with addititional specified particulars. That report and the recommendations of the commission, as I understand it, have been made to the Congress and are now before your committee.

Mr. HEMENWAY. There is nothing on the subject before the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SULZER. I will read the law. It was passed June 6, 1902, and is as follows:

That a commission hereby created, consisting of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster-General, and the Attorney-General of the United States, be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a suitable site in the city of New York, borough of Manhattan, and State of New York, upon which to erect a fireproof building for the use and accommodation of the United States post-office in said city: Provided, That the site selected shall be bounded on each side by a street. When said commission has acquired a site in said city, as herein provided, the commission shall make a report to Congress, stating the location, dimensions, and cost of the same, and recommend to Congress the character and size of a building that should be erected upon said site and state the probable cost of such a building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches.

Mr. Chairman, the report of the commission was duly made to the Congress and is now before the House. The site was selected, and it will cost about $2,000,000. This bill should appropriate the money. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] if he has any objection now to my offering an amendment that the sum recommended by the commission, $2,000,000, to purchase this site be incorporated in this bill?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I have, and I will make the point of order against it, because the Committee on Appropriations confines itself to the estimates received from the different Departments of the Government.

Mr. SULZER. Well, this is an estimate; this is in the nature of a contract to purchase the site, and the estimates are made by the Secretaries of three different Departments of the Government.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I do not think the gentleman understands me. There has been no estimate coming to the Committee on Appropriations for the item which the gentleman has mentioned.

Mr. SULZER. But, sir, a commission has been duly appointed under the statutes of Congress, and the commission has recommended an appropriation of $2,000,000 for this site. What better recommendation do you want than that? The money to buy the site must be appropriated by Congress, and nothing more can be done until the money is appropriated.

Mr. HEMENWAY. There has been no recommendation sent to the Committee on Appropriations with regard to the item at all and no one has appeared before the committee to advocate the placing of the item in the bill, and I would say to the gentleman, if any such person had appeared, we would not have heard him until it had been recommended by a Department.

Mr. SULZER. Well, then, I now ask the gentleman if he will raise a point of order against an amendment to this bill that the sum of $2,000,000 be appropriated for the purpose of acquiring the site in the city of New York for a new post-office?

Mr. HEMENWAY. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations would feel it to be his duty to make the point of order against it.

Mr. SULZER. Then I will ask the Chair how the Chair will rule on that point? Will the Chairman sustain the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. OLMSTED). The Chair will meet that when it arises.

Mr. SULZER. Then I move, Mr. Chairman, to amend the bill, after line 17, on page 18, by inserting:

That the sum of $2,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same hereby is, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to purchase the site in the city of New York heretofore recommended by the commission for the new post-office.

And I hope the gentleman from Indiana will not make a point of order against it. This is the urgent deficiency bill, and I know of no appropriation more urgently demanded than this appropriation to purchase the site for the new post-office in the city of New York. The money should have been appropriated by the last Congress. It must be appropriated by this Congress.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that it is not authorized by law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 18, after line 17, add: "That the sum of $2,000,000 or so much thereof as may be necessary be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to purchase the site in the city of New York heretofore recommended by the commission for the new post-office.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The point of order, Mr. Chairman, is that it is not authorized by law.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I want to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I suggest, if the gentleman from New York will permit, that these items for public buildings as a rule are all carried in the sundry civil bill. It may be that the item the gentleman refers to will come in in the sundry civil appropriation bill. The items carried here are where there was not a sufficient amount appropriated for the construction of public buildings that were in the course of construction during the last Congress.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, if I understand the gentleman from Indiana correctly, the point of order he makes is simply that this is not the appropriate bill to carry this appropriation: that my amendment should be offered to the sundry civil bill when that bill comes up in this House.

Mr. HEMENWAY. No; I make the point of order that it was not authorized by law. I will be candid with the gentleman. I am not familiar with the law that the gentleman refers to.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, under the law of 1902, passed by Congress, a commission consisting of the Postmaster-General, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Attorney-General was appointed to select and locate a site in the city of New York for a new post-office. That commission met, organized, went to New York City, investigated the matter, finally selected a site, and made a report to Congress recommending the appropriation of $2,000,000 to purchase this site. That report is a public document and is before this House. Most of the Members of the House are familiar with the law appointing this commission, and it seems to me the point of order is not well taken and it should not be sustained.

It seems to me that where there is a law to acquire the site the appropriation ought to be made, otherwise the site can not be acquired. The commission recommended the appropriation of $2,000,000. I think the objections of the gentleman from Indiana are untenable. I think it has been held by the present Chairman of the committee and other Chairmen of the Committee of the Whole House that where a law has been passed appointing a commission to acquire a site for a public building and they enter into a contract to purchase the site it is incumbent upon the House of Representatives to appropriate the money. It is immaterial whether the appropriation is carried in the urgent deficiency bill or in the sundry civil bill. The situation in New York City regarding this post-office is to-day a shame—a crying shame.

The present post-office building in the city of New York is a disgrace to the Federal Government. It is old, damp, worn out, overcrowded, and dilapidated. It is totally unfit to properly transact its immense postal business. It was built many years ago, and its usefulness is now practically a thing of the past. New York City to-day is more in need of better post-office facilities than any other city in the United States. This old post-office building away down town is wholly inadequate, and has been so for years, to properly handle and distribute the vast amount of mail that comes in and goes out of the great metropolis. It is damp and dirty and dingy. It is cramped and clammy and unhealthy. The Government employees there, compelled to work underground, are daily endangering their health and risking their lives, and are so crowded for lack of space and necessary room that it is impossible to expedite the distribution of important mail matter; and this deplorable situation affects, I say, not only the people in the city of New York, but the people all over the country, because it is well known that New York City is our greatest postal distributer.

Mr. Chairman, the post-office of New York City pays the Government an immense revenue profit every year; more, I believe, than any other three cities in the land, and more than many States of the Union. The net annual revenue from the New York City post-office is about $6,000,000, and increasing more and more every year. With these apparent facts staring us in the face, it is a shame, in my judgment, that for this reason or that excuse it has been absolutely impossible for the people of New York City, or their representatives in Congress, to get Congress to remedy the postal evils in New York City and give the people there a post-office that will reflect credit on the Federal Government and facilitate the distribution of the mails.

It is well known, Mr. Chairman, to those Members familiar with this question that after several years of weary effort and arduous struggle we finally succeeded in getting the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of this House to pass a law merely appointing a commission composed of the Postmaster-General, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Attorney-General to go to New York City and select a suitable site for the new post-office building. No appropriation to pay for the site was made in this law, because we were told such a proposition was unheard of and contrary to precedent, and that no appropriation was ever made by Congress until the site was selected, and that just so soon as the site was selected Congress would forthwith appropriate all necessary money to pay for the same and to begin the construction of the building.

That is all, Mr. Chairman, I care to say at this time. I trust you will overrule the point of order. It should be immaterial what bill carries this appropriation so long as it is made—and it ought to be made now.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. OLMSTED). Accepting the statement of the gentleman from New York as to the condition of the law, the Chair is of the opinion that it is not such as would authorize this appropriation. The mere appointment of a board for the purpose of selecting a site, but with no authority to purchase the site when selected, does not constitute such a beginning of a public work that the appropriation involved in this proposed amendment can be considered as in continuation of an appropriation for a public work; but, in any event, such an appropriation would be in order, if at all, upon the sundry civil bill, and not upon this, which is an urgent deficiency bill to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and for prior years. The Chair, therefore, sustains the point of order.

Mr. SULZER. Very well, Mr. Chairman, I shall offer the amendment to the sundry civil bill, and if it is objected to I hope you will be in the chair to rule it in order on that bill.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Heating apparatus for public buildings: For heating, hoisting, and ventilating apparatus, $25,000.

Mr. LIND. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the paragraph which has just been read.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 9, on page 20, amend by adding "providing so much of this appropriation as shall be necessary shall be devoted to the construction and installation of necessary elevators in the public building at Minneapolis, Minn."

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman from Minnesota that that item of $25,000 was placed in the bill for the purpose of constructing an elevator in a public building in the city of Minneapolis; that the Chief Architect stated to the committee that if this appropriation was made they could immediately commence the construction. It has not been the policy of the House to appropriate specifically for different elevators in different buildings, and I believe it would be bad policy to commence now. For that reason I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota, and I hope he will not insist upon his amendment.

Mr. LIND. Mr. Chairman, if this were not an exceptional case I would very gladly accept the explanation of the chairman, but the situation is very peculiar. A contract is now being executed for the addition of two upper stories to the post-office building at Minneapolis—which is confessedly inadequate—and unless this appropriation is made at this time, it will necessitate the making of two jobs of the improvements now in progress, and that are absolutely essential to enable the postmaster to carry on the Government business. The architect says that unless this designation is had he will not feel justified in spending this amount of money designed for Minneapolis at that place. If I did not feel that this were an exceptional case, and that the point of order is not well taken as applied to this case——

Mr. HEMENWAY. Let me say to the gentleman that no point of order has been made.

Mr. LIND. Well, then, I ask for a vote on my amendment.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Before voting, I want to insist that this amendment ought to be defeated. If the gentleman from Minnesota is entitled to have placed on the bill a provision directing that a certain portion of this money shall be appropriated for Minneapolis, then Baltimore and eight or ten other cities of the United States which are claiming that they ought to have elevators in public buildings are entitled to a like provision. Before the committee we were fair with the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LIND], and we suggested the importance of this work to the architect in charge. He advised it and it appears in the hearings that if the additional sum of $25,000 be appropriated work could begin immediately at the Minneapolis building, and I insist that this amendment—which is in violation of the rule heretofore adopted, namely, not to appropriate specifically for this, that, or the other elevator, but leave it with the architect to take the lump sum and put elevators where they are most needed—should not prevail. The architect agrees that an elevator is needed in this building, and I do not believe we ought to fix a precedent here which will afterwards come back to embarrass the House, and I hope the amendment will be defeated.

Mr. LIND. Will the chairman of the committee permit a question?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Certainly.

Mr. LIND. Does the chairman have the assurance and the abiding confidence that this money will be disposed of just as he has indicated, if appropriated?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I have no doubt it will. The architect before the committee, in reply to the question as to whether or not if this money were appropriated work could begin on this elevator, said it could begin immediately.

Mr. LIND. And it was made specifically for this purpose, to meet the emergency at Minneapolis?

Mr. HEMENWAY. That was the object of the committee increasing the appropriation to $25,000.

Mr. LIND. Under those circumstances, Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT—OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY.

Salaries, office of Secretary of the Navy: For one clerk at the rate of $2,250 per annum for the balance of the fiscal year 1904, $933.10, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee what the occasion is for the appointment of this $2,250 clerk?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I will say that an appropriation for the appointment of a new clerk is carried in the legislative bill for the next year, and at the urgent request of the Secretary of the Navy it was put in the deficiency bill so that he could have the use of the clerk right away.

Mr. HAY. It is an increase, however, of clerks, is it not?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Yes. The Secretary of the Navy wanted an increase of help and wanted it right away, so we gave it to him on the deficiency bill as well as on the legislative.

The Clerk read as follows:

NAVAL ESTABLISHMENT.

Emergency fund, Navy Department: To meet unforeseen contingencies for the maintenance of the Navy constantly arising, to be expended at the discretion of the President, for the fiscal year 1904, $10,000.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee what the need is for this fund?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Well, it is a fund that has been provided for many years.

Mr. HAY. Is it not added to what has already been provided?

Mr. HEMENWAY. This item here of $10,000 is of course additional. It is a deficiency.

Mr. HAY. What extraordinary expenses have occurred?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I will read what the Secretary says:

The "emergency fund" is an outgrowth of the war with Spain. It is a constantly decreasing fund, and in a sense it is a contingent fund with the additional security that exists under it, requiring the approval of the President. There are constantly large contingencies arising in the Navy all over the world. We have expended the whole of our emergency fund for this year, and it is very clear that we shall have other emergencies before the 1st of July, and it would be a very great convenience, arising almost to a necessity, that we should have this increase in our emergency fund.

Mr. HAY. How much was the fund for the year?

Mr. RIXEY. Twenty-five thousand dollars.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Twenty-five thousand dollars.

Mr. HAY. So that this fund is by this appropriation increased to $35,000?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Just for this year.

Mr. RIXEY. I would like to state to the chairman that, instead of its being a decreasing fund, it is an increasing fund, because the Secretary in his statement before the committee——

Mr. HEMENWAY. Oh, no. I will call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that in 1903 there was appropriated for this fund $100,000, and in 1904 we reduced the amount to $25,000. Adding this $10,000 will make it only $35,000, as against $100,000 in 1903.

Mr. RIXEY. I merely want to call attention to the fact that the Secretary was before the committee this week and asked to have that fund increased to $50,000.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Then it would still be a great reduction from the fund appropriated in 1903.

Mr. RIXEY. The beginning of this fund was with the Spanish war, I would state to the chairman, and if he will look at the debates on the naval bill during the last session of Congress I think he will find the statement made that this emergency fund should go out of the bill at the present time.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Of course, following the suggestion of the Secretary of the Navy, this item is placed in the bill. Any one thinking that the item is not necessary could move to strike it out. I have great faith in the judgment of the Secretary of the Navy, and he states that the sum is necessary.

Mr. RIXEY. I also have great confidence in the opinion of the Secretary of the Navy. That is the only reason I do not move to strike out the paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Bringing home remains of officers and men, Navy and Marine Corps, who die abroad: To enable the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, to cause to be transported to their homes the remains of officers and enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps who die or are killed in action, ashore or afloat, outside of the continental limits of the United States, $15,000: Provided, That the sum herein appropriated shall be available for transportation of the remains of officers and men who have died or who have been killed while on duty at any time since April 21, 1898, and shall be available until used, and applicable to past as well as future obligations.

Mr. RIXEY. I suggest to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations whether it would not be proper to enlarge the provisions of this paragraph so as to apply not only to the remains of officers and enlisted men, but to those of civil employees who have been sent from this country to the Philippine Islands. In support of that suggestion I will say that the naval bill for this year——

Mr. HEMENWAY. I think that on the sundry civil appropriation bill we provide for bringing home the bodies of civil employees. I think the provision in that bill is sufficient.

Mr. RIXEY. I was about to state that in the appropriation bill for the naval establishment, which is now being considered in the committee, provision is made for 1905 for bringing home the remains of civil employees as well as those of officers and men.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I think, then, the matter is fully covered, because the item on the sundry civil bill provides for bringing home the remains of civil employees.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay amounts found due by the accounting officers of the Treasury on account of the appropriation for "Bringing home remains of officers and men, Navy and Marine Corps, who die abroad," $237.08.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after line 10, on page 30, the following:

"To reimburse to owner the expense of repairing damages sustained by tug Hustler, run down from astern and sunk by U. S. S. Yankton, $5,301.81."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Naval Training Station, Rhode Island: For installation of ventilating system, $9,098.68; for installation of urinals, $700; for construction of frame building for detention of recruits and moving of sterilizing plant, $4,500; in all, $14,298.68.

Mr. RIXEY. I make a point of order against that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. RIXEY. This provides for new work at the Naval Training Station, Rhode Island. It provides in part for "installation of ventilating system," for "construction of frame building for detention of recruits," etc. It seems to me that matters of this kind belong properly to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. HEMENWAY. As I understand, this item is for work already done and not paid for. In the hearings the Secretary of the Navy said:

The Naval Training Station in Rhode Island arises out of this condition: We have a training station on Coasters Island, where apprentice boys are taken when they first enlist and kept for a period of six months before they are sent to sea. An epidemic of pneumonia and diseases of that character broke out. The conditions became very serious indeed. We had to take a part of our boys away, and it became a matter of humanity to remove the cause as quickly as possible.

I had a medical board appointed and they reported that the ventilation system, the urinals, and the frame building for the detention of recruits should be constructed, at a cost altogether of $14,298. We did it from the general appropriation for the maintenance of that station, which, as I recall it, is $55,000. That, of course, was an unexpected burden upon that appropriation, which is now almost exhausted, and therefore I ask that this special appropriation may be provided, leaving our general appropriation to do its work in a normal way.

Mr. RIXEY. It seems to me that the language of the provision is unfortunate, but the explanation, I think, brings the matter within the rules. I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Navy-yard, Boston, Mass.: For extensions and modifications, yards and docks power plant, $188,700.

Mr. RIXEY. I ask the chairman of the committee whether this is not an entirely new item, not simply a deficiency?

Mr. HEMENWAY. The Secretary of the Navy said in regard to this item:

The item in regard to Boston was submitted to me originally for the regular bill. I said that it should go into the urgent deficiency bill. It arose out of this condition: The new dry dock at Boston will be completed in the spring. It is a very important dry dock for us. We are just hanging by one button on dry-dock facilities and they may break down at any moment. We want this dock for use in the spring. The power house for which this is designed is about completed. There is installed in it a lot of plant that was constructed when electric power was in its infancy. This should be put in that new power house at the earliest date, not only for lighting the yard and lighting the ships that are under repair, but for power for the operation of this new dock. I consider it as important an item as there is in the bill.

Mr. RIXEY. The Committee on Naval Affairs had under consideration the advisability of consolidating these plants, and it does seem to me that this matter ought to be considered by that committee and reported upon by it. If the plants should be consolidated, the impression is that the work of consolidation will go to the Bureau of Yards and Docks. But the naval bill has not been reported by the committee, and I think this provision ought to wait until that bill shall be reported. I therefore make a point of order against the paragraph.

Mr. HEMENWAY. This matter having been discussed, I think the point of order comes too late. Of course I have no feeling about the matter one way or the other, except that I am assured by the statement of the Secretary of the Navy that this is a deficiency. The appropriation for work at that navy-yard has been exhausted, and the Secretary says that he considers this one of the most important items in the bill. He gives his reasons that, as he puts it, they are hanging there on one button; that the dry-dock facilities may break down at any moment, and they want this dock for use in the spring.

Of course if they have it for use in the spring they must get the money on this bill. The money provided on the bill reported from the gentleman's committee would not be available until July 1; so if the Secretary has this dry dock for use in the spring he must have this appropriation now. I do not think it is subject to a point of order, but——

Mr. RIXEY. The chairman of the committee is entirely familiar with the fact that different committees frequently make portions of appropriations immediately available.

Mr. HEMENWAY. That provision on an appropriation bill is subject to a point of order.

Mr. RIXEY. It is very frequently done. If this is a matter of importance it could be done in that way.

Mr. HEMENWAY. That is not the proper way to legislate. It is subject to a point of order to make an item immediately available, and that is further evidence that the item is in order on this bill. I do not undertake to say that I know as much about the necessity for it as the gentleman himself. I only have before me the information given by the Secretary of the Navy, in which he states that it is very important; that the Navy Department, as he puts it, is now hanging on one button; their dry dock is liable to break down.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana insist on his point of order?

Mr. HEMENWAY. The point of order, I understood, was not made.

Mr. RIXEY. I made the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Virginia to make the point of order, but he understood the gentleman from Indiana to make the point that it came too late.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Oh, yes; we had been discussing it for ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair then sustains the point of order made by the gentleman from Indiana, that the point made by the gentleman from Virginia, not having been made until after there had been debate, came too late.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

UNDER THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

For necessary expenditures incident to the occupation and utilization of the naval station at Guantanamo, Cuba, to be used for such purposes as the Secretary of the Navy may direct, $200,000.

Mr. RIXEY. I should like to have some explanation of the paragraph at the foot of page 33, the sum of $200,000. I should like to know what that is to be expended for. In order that I may be in time, I reserve the point of order.

Mr. HEMENWAY. On page 60 I quote from the statement of Secretary Moody, in the hearing before the committee:

NAVAL STATION, GUANTANAMO, CUBA.

The next item is Guantanamo, which I consider is of the highest importance.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Give us fully the reason?

Secretary MOODY. I will give it to you as briefly as I can. As you know, the law which has been called the Platt amendment provided that Cuba should sell or lease to the United States land necessary for coaling or naval stations at certain specific points to be agreed upon between the President of the United States and the Government of Cuba. A year ago the coming February an agreement was entered into between the two Governments, specifying the points where the naval stations should be, one at Bahia Honda, which is about 60 miles west of Habana, and the other at Guantanamo, which is about 40 miles west of Santiago.

It is not the purpose of the Department to do anything at the present time at Bahia Honda, but at Guantanamo it is proposed to build up a naval station of the first class. Our interests in the West Indies now are so important that nothing will serve them except the establishment of such a station. We have made a subsequent agreement with Cuba which provides the rental which we shall pay for the land which has been leased to us at Guantanamo. Those lands contain about 18,000 acres. They are to be bought by the United States Government, and the estimated cost is $137,000—not an unreasonable cost. We had a general appropriation, to be expended under my direction, of $100,000 last year. I ask for $200,000 this year. The $300,000 are to be expended for the acquisition of the lands, the price to be paid for the land, the leveling of the land and preparing it for future use, some little dredging, the survey of the land, the fencing of the land, and other general work of that character, which in detail amounts to about $300,000.

We need that money now. We, of course, want to pay for the land and we want to begin to prepare this station for occupancy. Of course I do not intend to ask any further general appropriation. There has been an estimate sent to the Naval Committee for the construction of certain buildings and works there—a dry dock, among other things—specifying in detail the purposes of the expenditures; but at this time I want the $200,000 for this preliminary work, and it is impracticable to specify it. It will be the last general appropriation I shall ask.

The Secretary simply wants added to the $100,000 he now has the sum of $200,000 more, to enable the Department to purchase the lands and prepare them for the buildings, so as to be ready to go ahead.

The Clerk read as follows:

UNDER BUREAU OF NAVIGATION.

For pay of inspector engaged upon work in connection with extension to Naval War College at Newport, R. I., $650.

Mr. HAY. On the paragraph beginning with line 1, on page 34, I reserve the point of order, and ask the chairman what this inspector is for. I desire to know whether this is adding to somebody's salary or whether it is an independent inspector, who he is, and what he does? I reserve the point of order.

Mr. HEMENWAY. In reply to the gentleman's question, I find the answer of the Secretary of the Navy, who says:

The next item is for the pay of an inspector, simply because of the delay on the building at Newport, which requires the inspector to be employed a few months longer than he would have been.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For clerk hire, rent, and other incidental expenses of the district land offices: Provided, That this appropriation shall be available for the payment of per diem, in lieu of subsistence, not exceeding $3 per day, of clerks detailed to examine the books of and assist in opening new land offices and reservations while on such duty and for actual necessary traveling expenses of said clerks, including necessary sleeping-car fares: Provided further, That no expenses chargeable to the Government shall be incurred by registers and receivers in the conduct of local land offices except upon previous specific authorization by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, $35,000.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out of line 14, page 39, the word "thirty-five," and insert in lieu thereof the word "fifty."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming offers the following amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 14, page 39, strike out "thirty-five" and insert in lieu thereof "fifty;" so that it will read "fifty thousand dollars."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, my reason for offering this amendment is that the sum of $50,000 and more is urgently required by the General Land Office for the purposes specified in this item. The General Land Office last year asked for $220,000 for this class of work. An appropriation of $200,000 was made. We all know the work of the local land offices has very largely increased in the past year, and the amount asked for would not have been sufficient to pay the necessary expenditures. Twenty thousand dollars less than was asked was appropriated, and the deficiency therefore becomes greater than it otherwise would have been.

It will be remembered that this appropriation is not for the purpose of carrying on new work or investigations which can be waived or left undone. It is for the purpose of carrying on the work of the people in connection with the entry of public lands. There is no local land office in the country that has a single solitary clerk more than is needed for the dispatch of the public business; and the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in a memorandum that I hold in my hand, says that if the amount now asked is not allowed it will be necessary to discharge over forty clerks at the various land offices. This being true, I hope the gentleman on the committee will not offer any objection to the increase asked for.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, the Secretary of the Interior for the fiscal year 1904 estimated for $220,000. We gave $200,000. Later on the Secretary comes in and asks for a deficiency, I think, of $55,000. We gave this $35,000, or $15,000 more than they asked for originally. The original amount we appropriated was $200,000, and $35,000 makes $235,000, against the $220,000 originally requested by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. MONDELL. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that it is utterly impossible for the Secretary of the Interior or anyone to accurately determine in advance how much business will be done at the local land offices. The business in the local land offices has trebled in the last two years. The income from the sale of public lands in the last fiscal year amounted to something like $11,000,000, or an increase of about $4,000,000 in round numbers over the year before, and the receipts for that year was nearly double the receipts of the year preceding. So that the business coming before the registers and receivers has increased by leaps and bounds.

It is absolutely necessary that the registers and receivers shall have clerical help enough to take care of the business coming before their offices. I am confident that neither the chairman of this committee nor any member of this committee wishes to have entrymen and intending entrymen on the public lands and those proposing to make final proof on their lands turned away from the land office because, forsooth, we refuse to appropriate a niggardly $25,000 or $30,000 for this necessary work.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do this for the purpose of asking the gentleman if it is not true that the large increase in the business of the Land Office, the demand for the larger number of clerks provided for, and the additional appropriation necessitating a large sum for that purpose have been due to the large number of fraudulent entries of land?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I will say to the gentleman that I do not think so at all. I have no knowledge that it is due to that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. It is a fact, is is not, that many millions of acres have thus been fraudulently entered in the last year or two?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not believe that is true. I believe that nine-tenths of the allegations of land fraud that have been made have been made by people who had a purpose in making such statements, and did it to serve their own personal ends, and that they are largely the paid agents of the transcontinental land-owning railways, who would like to have all the land laws repealed in order that the thirty or forty million acres which they own may find a better market.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Does not the gentleman acknowledge the fact, which has been stated in the report of the Secretary and also through the press, that millions of acres of public lands have gone astray by reason of fraudulent land entries?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I think the gentleman rather exaggerates the statements of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Then does the gentleman deny that millions of acres have gone astray by reason of fraudulent land entries, that the system through which it was done has been suspended by the Secretary, and this for the reason that the condition exists in regard to fraudulent land entries?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not pretend to know all about the land business of the Government, but I live in a State and have lived all my life in regions where public land was being entered. I live in a State where 85 per cent of the land is still public land, and I will say to the gentleman, so far as my personal knowledge is concerned, and I have taken some pains to investigate, my opinion is that in this year of grace there is less fraud in connection with public lands in the United States in proportion to the acres entered than there ever was before.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But the gentleman is not oblivious to the fact and he has evidently read the current public news which states that the Secretary of the Interior has repeatedly stated that there is a great amount of fraudulent land entries out in the western country; has he not?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman has not carefully read the Secretary's reports. I think the gentleman has read——

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I refer to newspapers and such information——

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman has probably read the land repeal bureau's edition of the Secretary's suggestions.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I have read the Secretary's statement and the newspaper interviews which were accredited at the time of the arrest of a gentleman engaged largely in it, but a few weeks ago, and the scandal that was ventilated in the newspapers. Surely the gentleman read that, and he knows, evidently, that some——

Mr. MONDELL. There is no question but what there has been some scandal in connection with the public lands, particularly as regards entries under timber and stone acts, in some parts of the country.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Then is it not in the interest of the public service to keep down the appropriations until these matters are regulated by the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I do not follow the gentleman's philosophy or agree with his reasoning.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. That is my judgment, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MONDELL. It seems to me if he takes——

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. In view of the fact that the gentleman is not responding to any of the inquiries which I have put to him——

Mr. MONDELL. How is that?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The gentleman is not responding to any inquiries I have put to him. I disagree entirely with the gentleman——

Mr. MONDELL. I beg the gentleman's pardon if I am taking his time; I did not intend to do so.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. No, the gentleman is not taking my time, but as he is not responding to any of my inquries here I will go on. I desire to emphasize the fact, Mr. Chairman, that that condition prevails not only with reference to this land, but the Secretary of the Interior, with the assistance of Congress, is trying to put it down, and therefore I would not at this time increase the appropriations over the head of the Appropriation Committee, which has carefully made its inquiry and presented its conclusion to this House, because, perchance, they might affect irrigation land out West or in other parts of the country in which there is public land.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I was out in the hall for a few minutes, and as I understand the amendment proposed increases the appropriation for the land offices. I want to call the attention of the committee to a memorandum that was made by the Land Department on the 27th of January, which states the situation exactly.

Either a large force of clerks must be furloughed or there must be an additional appropriation. The amount appropriated was, for clerk hire, $210,189.77; for rent of offices, $31,878.66; for incidental expenses, furniture, etc., $8,425.06. I should not say the amount appropriated, but the amount of expenditures authorized. That was what was authorized to be expended. The amount of appropriation is inadequate by $50,493.49, and to cover this deficiency an item was submitted to the committee for the urgent deficiency bill of $55,000. The amount appropriated in the bill is $35,000, which would still leave a deficit of $20,000. There are 116 land offices, in which 191 clerks are employed. These clerks receive salaries from $900 to $1,200. If only $35,000 is appropriated, this would still leave a deficit of $15,000, in order to meet which 33 clerks will have to be dismissed on February 1, but as it will require $5,000 for emergency purposes for the balance of the year it would be necessary to dismiss 44 clerks.

The situation is the same as it is in other Departments of the Government which have anything to do with the general condition of the country. The growth of the business of the country has met with a response in the business of the Land Office. The amount of land taken, the amount of business in this department has been greater than the year before, just as the business of disposing of private land by private owners has increased in the last year, and the year before, and the year before that, and for a number of years. So it is necessary that this work should proceed. If the department is embarrassed by inadequate funds, the business must be suspended to that extent, and the request for an appropriation of $55,000 is a moderate one. The income to the Government land offices is enormously in excess of the expenditure in carrying on the business of the department, which is, in fact, the largest ever known within the present generation for the past year.

Now, this requires that instead of discharging or furloughing clerks they should be kept at work. The Department is not demanding an increase of force, but they do not think this is a proper time to furlough clerks in order to keep inside of an appropriation. They have asked for $55,000. This is a reasonable request, covering the actual deficit, and they are only given $35,000. Why give them anything? Why give them $35,000? Because it is needed, and $55,000 is just as much needed as $35,000. I ask the chairman of the committee to accept this amendment. It is a very moderate request—a reasonable one—and one that is necessary in order to properly carry on the Government business.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I know the gentleman from Iowa will be frank with us. I would like to ask him if the Secretary of the Interior does not ask for this larger appropriation for the purpose of having more inspectors to discover fraudulent land entries?

Mr. LACEY. That is not involved in this appropriation.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Is not this appropriation available for that purpose?

Mr. LACEY. This proposition does not cover that question.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I ask if it is not available for that purpose?

Mr. LACEY. Not at all; it is for the ordinary business of the Department for the various clerks in the employ of the Department. The Secretary asked for this as a deficiency for carrying on the business for the remainder of this fiscal year.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Does the gentleman from Iowa agree with the gentleman from Wyoming as to the extent of the land frauds by which the business of the various Departments has largely increased within the last two years?

Mr. LACEY. I do not care to discuss the question of land frauds in this connection, because it is a long subject that I could not discuss in the time that I have and make it intelligent to the committee. At some future time I desire to take the House into the confidence of the Committee on Public Lands and give them all the information that the committee has.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The gentleman can tell us whether the Secretary has not suspended the rules by which the fraudulent land entries were encouraged and under which the operators operated.

Mr. LACEY. Oh, there have been land frauds ever since the ordinance of 1785, and there will be land frauds as long as there is a public domain. The Department will endeavor to eliminate and prevent as many of them as is possible. There are land frauds no doubt now in cases pending before the Department. The Department of the Interior is not only trying to put them down with all the power it has, but it is doing it with vigor.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Was not the large business which makes it necessary to call for this additional appropriation caused by the land frauds, and has not the Secretary of the Interior suspended the rules under which they operated?

Mr. LACEY. No; I think not. You take the State of North Dakota, and the homestead entries there for last year were over 16,900 quarter sections, and I will venture to say there is not 1 per cent that were fraudulent. There are 16,900 quarter sections in a locality that up to within a few years was not generally sought by the public. The rainfall for the last three years has extended over that region and given them abundant harvests in a region that was regarded as arid five years ago. For the last three years it has produced an abundance of crops. You take that single State of North Dakota as an example, perhaps the most striking one, and the homestead entries of 16,900 quarter sections show the marvelous and wondrous growth. The receipts from the land office at Minot and the receipts from the land office at Bismarck have been enormous, enough to a good deal more than pay this additional appropriation, I think, twice over, so that while there have been frauds the amount of legitimate business has been enormously increased. People are moving to the West and occupying every foot of available land for homestead entries.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last words. I would like to say a word in relation to this. This appropriation, as I understand it, is called for by the Secretary of the Interior in order to keep in employment of the Government the number of clerks that are now doing land-office business in the various land offices of the United States. To curtail that appropriation to $35,000 would of necessity dispense with a great many of those clerks, as they are not getting a large amount of salary. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] has asked whether or not these men do anything in the way of ferreting out frauds. I will state to the gentleman from Indiana that if you were to curtail this force you would of necessity curtail to some extent at least the examination of frauds, because inquiries are continually made in the various local land offices as to what has been preempted and what has been located on. Consequently, if you diminish the force there, you will of necessity delay the replies of the register and receiver to the Secretary of the Interior.

Now, it seems to me that from every standpoint this appropriation ought to be passed—from the standpoint of efficiency of administration, from the standpoint of not impeding the location upon lands by honest settlers in the West, and also from the standpoint of the very purpose which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] seeks, namely, that whatever inquiries may be made with relation to actual fraudulent entry the various registers and receivers can give them speedily.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But the gentleman differs from the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] as to the availability of the funds to the end of protecting the public lands against frauds.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It is not available for certain kinds, but you can see, if an inspector or if any person is ferreting out these frauds and makes inquiries of these local officers, they have got to have a sufficient force to answer them and answer them quickly. If that force is diminished to a point where it is necessary only to do the ordinary business, anyone can see that of necessity it would diminish the efficiency of the force, because it would take a longer time to get replies.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Why not be fair to the House, and state that the reason for it is to ferret out the gross frauds that have obtained in the last two years, if such be the purpose?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; I think the reason for it is to have a due administration of the laws, as far as it can be given. These clerks are necessary. They are not large-salaried clerks. They do the work in these offices, and to discharge them now would impede the work and a reply to every inquiry that is made of these officers. It seems to me that this appropriation should pass.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word and send to the Clerk's desk to be read a synopsis of the report of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. TAWNEY. The first question to be taken will be on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of getting the floor. I ask for recognition to have the Clerk read a brief synopsis of the report of the Secretary bearing on this section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

With respect to the necessity of an increased appropriation for the protection of the public domain, it can truly be said that the need of a field force was never greater. From every section of the country there comes to this office complaints of the disposition of the public lands in violation of law, and in the despoliation of the timber and the maintenance of unlawful inclosures upon the lands. These complaints cite cases where it is found upon investigation that speculators, cattle companies, corporations, and individuals are all engaged in an effort to plunder the public domain. Entries are being made without residence or improvement, timber lands are being taken for speculation, and fictitious proofs are being made, especially before officers other than registers and receivers, as to the compliance of the claimants with the laws.

The present appropriation furnishes scanty support to scarcely sixty agents, and it is only necessary to state it in order to emphasize the impotency of the present force to reach out over the vast area of public lands and protect them from the wholesale frauds that are now being attempted. Not only is the present field force required to cover the large area of lands and prepare the cases for prosecution, but they are required to assist in the prosecution of those cases at hearings before the local officers and in suits before the courts. This and many incidental matters necessarily consume a large portion of the time of the special agents, and prevent them from giving their entire time and attention to the investigation of cases in the field.

The amount of work done by the field force during the past year in all classes of cases has been such as to call loudly for recognition in the form of increased appropriation, in order that the work in which they have been engaged may be made effective by securing the cancellation of fraudulent entries and settlements for timber unlawfully taken from the lands, and in compelling the removal of inclosures unlawfully maintained.

If the purposes for which the public domain was originally opened to the home builders are to be kept in mind, there should be a determined effort made to secure a rigorous enforcement of the beneficent laws which have been enacted in pursuance of that purpose.

The developments of the past six months have satisfied me that the present appropriations are wholly inadequate to enable the office to secure anything like an effective execution of the laws and to clear the records of any considerable portion of the large number of alleged fraudulent entries now awaiting action.

There can be no doubt of the great necessity for the increased appropriation. This is demonstrated by the fact that there are now nearly 20,000 entries which are suspended on the charge of fraud. About half of this number are in the different stages of adjustment. Many have been relieved from suspension, and many have been canceled upon Government proceedings. About 6,000 entries under the timber-land law of June 3, 1878, have been suspended on a showing satisfactory to this office that they have not been made in compliance with law, but in the interest of other persons and corporations. So specific and comprehensive are the complaints, that by departmental order of November 18, 1902, all entries heretofore made or hereafter to be made under that act are suspended pending investigation by a special agent into the bona fides of the entrymen. There are about 2,500 entries which have been commuted under the homestead law without sufficient showing of residence or improvements. Nearly 1,000 soldiers' additional applications under section 2306 and a large number of soldiers' widows' applications under section 2307 are also shown to have been made in violation of the laws. To this must be added the large number of cases involved in timber trespass and unlawful inclosures.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to be permitted to continue for three minutes.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the limitation has run on this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make the point of order that debate has been exhausted on this paragraph?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I ask for only three minutes.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that he may be permitted to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, that is the statement of the Secretary of the Interior, made in his report. This proposition to increase the appropriation over the head of the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations, I think, ought not to be granted, even though it be for a purpose stated by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] and the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] and also the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH].

Mr. LACEY. Is not the gentleman mistaken? This is a deficiency appropriation. The request he makes is for the permanent annual appropriation.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Then the gentleman who says this makes no difference is mistaken. This appropriation, he says, is not available for the purpose. The Secretary desires it in the line of the investigation of the great fraudulent land entries. I commend those statements of the Secretary of the Interior. The only other reason why this should be granted, outside of the one mentioned by the gentleman from Iowa and the one I have mentioned—the ferreting out of fraud—is because the irrigation communities desire again to appeal to the United States Treasury, although they promised on this floor that if we would pass the irrigation act they would not come back again to ask for a general appropriation. Yet by every avenue they can enter, by every means that they can devise, they come here trooping along, asking in some sense or in some way for an additional appropriation for the great ventures out in the irrigable land region.

I would have frankness from gentlemen on this floor. If they desire this money for the purpose of ferreting out frauds, I hope they will say so and not stand on the floor here and make statements which would seem to imply otherwise. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] was very frank about this matter, and said he thought the appropriation would in some slight way be available for that purpose.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The irrigation act, as I understand——

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I now renew the point of order that the debate on the paragraph is exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The question being taken, there were on a division (called for by Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana)—ayes 58, noes 26.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For furnishing transcripts of records and plats, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, $4,500: Provided, That copyists employed under this appropriation shall be selected by the Secretary of the Interior at a compensation of $2 per day while actually employed, at such times and for such periods as the exigencies of the work may demand.

Mr. LACEY. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

For per diem in lieu of subsistence of inspectors and of clerks detailed to investigate fraudulent land entries, trespasses on the public lands, and cases of misconduct, $1,500.

The Chairman proceeded to put the question on agreeing to the amendment, and said, "The ayes seem to have it."

Mr. HEMENWAY. I want to discuss that amendment. I supposed that the gentleman from Iowa had some explanation to offer. I call for a division, if necessary.

Mr. LACEY. I hope this matter will be left open, by unanimous consent, until it can be explained.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the vote will be withheld until the amendment has been explained.

Mr. HAY. I object. I call for the regular order.

The question being again taken, there were—ayes 8, noes 30.

So the amendment of Mr. LACEY was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Removal of intruders, Five Civilized Tribes: For the purpose of removing intruders and placing allottees in unrestricted possession of their allotments, $15,000.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I raise a point of order on the paragraph just read. I submit that it is not in accordance with the existing law, but is a new provision. I will state very frankly that in the Fifty-sixth Congress a provision of this kind was passed, but it was omitted in the Fifty-seventh Congress. No similar provision was adopted in that Congress; consequently it is not existing law.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I understand that there is a provision of law that when necessary the Commissioners of the Five Civilized Tribes, constituting what is called the "Dawes Commission," shall put these Indians in actual possession of their land after it has been apportioned to them. The testimony of the Indian Commissioner before the committee was to that effect; and as an appropriation heretofore made for this purpose has been exhausted, this provision has been inserted in the bill to carry out that proposition of the law. I understand that there is already an enactment of law to this effect so far as the Dawes Commission is concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to state that the law now requires the Dawes Commission to place these Indians in possession of their lands?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. In actual possession of their lands. The appropriation to pay the agent to put them in possession of their lands has been exhausted.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I was not aware of any law of that kind now existing.

The CHAIRMAN. Can the gentleman from Alabama cite the law?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have not the volume at hand, but I think the chairman of the committee [Mr. HEMENWAY] can probably do so.

Mr. HEMENWAY. In the treaties with the different tribes of Indians we have a provision that the Indians shall be put in possession of their allotments.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. What law is that?

Mr. HEMENWAY. In all these treaties with the different Indian tribes there is that provision that where the land is allotted the Indians shall be placed in possession of their allotments. Now let me state the necessity for this appropriation as shown in the hearings. In one case, we will suppose, a man has a pasture of 75,000 acres. The land is allotted. An Indian comes and claims possession of the piece of land allotted to him. The man in charge, the occupant of the land, bluffs him off and says, "You can not have it."

The CHAIRMAN. Can the gentleman from Indiana cite for the information of the Chair the statute referred to?

Mr. HEMENWAY. We can secure one of these treaties so as to show it to the Chair later on. I ask unanimous consent that we pass the item and go ahead with the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I have other objections to the section. I desire to move to strike it out, and also to amend it, when we return to it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it will be passed.

Mr. HEMENWAY. If the gentleman desires to move to strike it out, we can pass on the motion to strike it out now.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I desire a ruling as to whether or not it is germane or whether it is new legislation.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Reserve the right, if it is not stricken out, to raise the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The request is that the paragraph be passed, reserving to the gentleman from Texas the right to move to strike it out or to amend it. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Contingent expenses: For all necessary contingent and miscellaneous expenses of the office of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, the Bureaus of Manufactures and Corporations, and the bureaus and offices transferred to the Department of Commerce and Labor, including the purchase of professional and scientific books, law books, books of reference, periodicals, blank books, pamphlets, maps, newspapers (not exceeding $2,500), stationery, furniture and repairs to the same, carpets, matting, oilcloth, file cases, towels, ice, brooms, soap, sponges, fuel, lighting and heating; for the purchase, exchange, and care of horses and vehicles, to be used only for official purposes, and for rent of stable therefor from July 15, 1903, to June 30, 1904; freight and express charges, postage, telegraph and telephone service, typewriters, and adding machines, and all other miscellaneous items and necessary expenses not included in the foregoing, $35,000.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, on page 45, line 3, I move to strike out the word "newspapers."

The amendment was read by the Clerk, as follows:

Page 45, line 3, strike out the word "newspapers."

Mr. HAY. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the committee why there should be an appropriation made for the office of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor for newspapers? The gentleman made a very sharp criticism on the Committee on Military Affairs the other day because they were making appropriations to buy what he called "French novels." Now, I do not know why we should appropriate for newspapers for the Department of Commerce and Labor.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The gentleman evidently misunderstood the gentleman from Indiana the other day. I was not opposing the item of newspapers or any necessary item. What I was seeking to do was to limit the amount that could be expended for these purposes, and if the gentleman will notice, in this bill we do exactly what I was seeking to do on the military bill. Of this item of $35,000 we provide that not to exceed $2,500 shall be expended for—

Professional and scientific books, law books, books of reference, periodicals, blank books, pamphlets, maps, and newspapers.

Mr. HAY. Why should we appropriate for newspapers?

Mr. HEMENWAY. The Department of Commerce and Labor have to advertise in newspapers for all the supplies they buy, and in many instances under the law are required to advertise in certain newspapers. Now, in order that they may know that the advertisements have been inserted, they must subscribe for a limited number of newspapers. The item, of course, in this bill, as in all other bills coming from the Committee on Appropriations, is now limited to a certain amount of money that can be expended for the purchase of books, newspapers, and periodicals.

Mr. HAY. But you do not limit the amount that may be expended for periodicals and newspapers.

Mr. HEMENWAY. This is a part of the appropriation for professional and scientific books, law books, books of reference, periodicals, blank books, pamphlets, maps, and newspapers. All of those items shall not exceed $2,500, out of the total appropriation of $35,000.

Mr. PAYNE. May I suggest to the gentleman that the Bureau of Statistics is in this Department of Commerce and Labor?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. Does it not necessarily have to take a number of newspapers?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Oh, yes; there is the Bureau of Statistics, the Bureau of Navigation, and a whole lot of other bureaus.

Mr. PAYNE. They have to subscribe to technical newspapers and other newspapers.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Certainly.

Mr. HAY. Do they have to subscribe for periodicals?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Yes; many of them.

Mr. HAY. For Ainslee's Magazine and Harper's, etc.?

Mr. HEMENWAY. No.

Mr. HAY. You provide for it here. They can buy them.

Mr. HEMENWAY. No.

Mr. HAY. The gentleman said the other day in debate that the head of a Department was buying all sorts of books and periodicals and magazines.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Yes.

Mr. HAY. Now, I want to know why they could not buy any periodical they please under this appropriation?

Mr. HEMENWAY. No, sir; because we ascertain the amount of money necessary to buy the actual papers and periodicals that they need for their professional use and limit the amount that can be used to that sum.

Mr. HAY. Why can not they take part of the $2,500 to which you limit them and subscribe for any periodical they choose?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Because they are prohibited, first, by law from doing that.

Mr. HAY. Where is the law that prohibits them?

Mr. HEMENWAY. And next, because the amount of money authorized in this item is not sufficient. The gentleman ought to be fair. Under the item in the army bill you have a large lump sum appropriated, running into the thousands of dollars, as we have here. Now, all I asked of the gentleman was to limit the amount that should be authorized to be used to buy books and buy periodicals and newspapers, etc., just as we limit it in this bill.

Mr. HAY. Why, it was limited there.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Oh, no; it was not.

Mr. HAY. Why, the contention of the gentleman——

Mr. HEMENWAY. It was by the amendment that was put on.

Mr. HAY. Why, the contention of the gentleman from Indiana was that the periodicals and newspapers provided for in that item, as in this, had no limitation upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I ask that the gentleman have three minutes additional time.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the time of the gentleman will be extended for five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. HAY. The point made by the gentleman from Indiana was that under that appropriation the money could be expended for any book the head of the Department desired. So now, I say, under "periodicals" you can expend that or as much as you please in subscriptions to magazines. That was the contention that the gentleman from Indiana made, and an amendment was agreed to providing that it should be "professional periodicals," dealing with subjects pertaining to its own particular branch. I think the same ought to be done here.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Well, the gentleman will remember that the amendment offered by "the gentleman from Indiana" was to limit the amount that could be expended for periodicals, books, etc., to $200.

Mr. HAY. Periodicals and newspapers, $200.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I said then to the gentleman from Virginia if $200 was not sufficient amount, not being sufficiently familiar with it myself to fix the amount, they might fix the amount at a sufficient amount—just exactly what has been done by the Committee on Appropriations. Why, here is an appropriation for $35,000 for contingent expenses. We put in here a limit of $2,500 that can be expended out of this $35,000 item. Just exactly what I asked the gentleman to do on the army bill. Now, prior to the time limits were placed in the bills they could take any sum out of the lump sum appropriated and buy any book that they considered necessary, and thus build up libraries of fiction in the Departments. As soon as limitations were put upon it they have confined themselves to the items absolutely necessary, and there have been no more purchases of books of fiction in consequence.

Mr. HAY. Is it not a fact that under this provision of $2,500 for books of reference, etc., they can expend out of that $2,500 any amount they please for any kind of books they please?

Mr. HEMENWAY. No.

Mr. HAY. Why not?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Will the gentleman read the item?

Mr. HAY. You do not limit them?

Mr. HEMENWAY. It is evident that the gentleman has not read the bill.

Mr. HAY. I have read the bill.

Mr. HEMENWAY (reading). "Including the purchase of professional and scientific books, law books, books of reference, periodicals, blank books, pamphlets, maps, newspapers."

Mr. HAY. Does that mean "professional" periodicals?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Why, certainly.

Mr. HAY. Why not say so?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Why, we do it.

Mr. HAY. Oh, no.

Mr. HULL. Does not the gentleman from Indiana want to conform to the army bill and put in the word "technical?"

Mr. HEMENWAY. I did not put in that amendment; it was put in by a member of your own committee.

Mr. HAY. I suggest that you comply with your own suggestion and say that so much money will be expended for newspapers and periodicals, and comply with the suggestion that you insisted we should make in the army bill.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I do not say that they shall not have the right to subscribe for newspapers.

Mr. HAY. The gentleman says that they have got to do that, because they have advertisements in the newspapers and have got to take them in order to see that the advertisements appear in those newspapers.

Mr. HEMENWAY. And for the other reasons that I gave. The Bureau of Statistics is in this Department, and the Bureau of Navigation is there, and there are thirteen or fourteen divisions——

Mr. HAY. You say that the Bureau of Navigation is there?

Mr. HEMENWAY. The Bureau of Navigation is there, and there are thirteen or fourteen divisions covered by the Bureau of Labor.

Mr. HAY. I did not know that the Bureau of Navigation was there.

Mr. BOUTELL. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Yes.

Mr. HAY. I thought I had the floor.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I had the floor and yielded to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. BOUTELL. Will the gentleman from Virginia kindly yield?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. BOUTELL. In order, perhaps, to put as speedy an end as possible to this controversy and satisfy the gentleman from Virginia, I would like to call attention to this one expression of Thomas Jefferson——

Mr. HAY. I did not suppose that the gentleman could call attention to anything more after what he said the other day.

Mr. BOUTELL. Thomas Jefferson said, in writing to Edward Carrington:

> The basis of our governments being the opinion of the people, the very first object should be to keep that right; and were it left to me to decide whether we should have a government without newspapers or newspapers without a government, I should not hesitate a moment to prefer the latter.

I think that is good Democratic doctrine.

Mr. HAY. If that throws any light, it can only throw light upon the mind of the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has again expired.

Mr. HAY. Well, Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. PAYNE. If the gentleman will allow, I will move to strike out the last word and will take but a minute or two and then yield the balance of the time to him. Mr. Chairman, I want to suggest to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations there is a strong question as to whether his provision of the twenty-five hundred dollar limit applies to anything more than newspapers. I suggest that he amend by adding, after the word "dollars," "for all the foregoing."

Mr. HEMENWAY. I will say to the gentleman from New York that the Comptroller has passed upon this two or three times and holds that it applies to all these.

Mr. PAYNE. I suppose that makes the law for the present Comptroller, but it is not a sensible construction of the language.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I think it is.

Mr. PAYNE. Then, I want to ask the gentleman whether "professional and scientific" applies to anything more than the word "books," or whether it goes on down through the item?

Mr. HAY. That is a point I suggested all the time.

Mr. PAYNE. It will hardly apply to blank books.

Mr. HEMENWAY. You can not apply that to the newspapers and possibly not to periodicals, because there is the Bureau of Statistics, the Bureau of Labor; they can not conduct the business of those great bureaus without reading the newspapers of the country.

Mr. PAYNE. I agree with the gentleman; I think it is utterly impossible.

Mr. HEMENWAY. It is a wholly different proposition for the War Department, the Navy Department, or some other Department which does not need them for their official purposes.

Mr. PAYNE. That is the reason I asked the question. I did not know but what the Comptroller had decided that it applied also to the newspapers.

Mr. HAY. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York if the Bureau of Statistics relies upon newspapers for their statistics?

Mr. PAYNE. I suppose for market prices, yes. I do not see where they can get them elsewhere. The Bureau of Labor relies for information upon strikes and matters of that kind upon newspapers as well as other information they can get.

Mr. HAY. I am surprised to know it.

Mr. PAYNE. I suppose it is impossible for them to get along without having a large number of newspapers to gather their statistics from, such as may be of use to them. They must do that.

Mr. HAY. Of newspapers?

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. HAY. The same argument would apply as to the Navy or the Army or any other Department of the Government, that they rely for their information upon what appears in the newspapers.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not think so; but we will cross that bridge when we come to it on the naval bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Virginia, as I agreed to do.

Mr. HAY. Well, I was going to get it in my own right.

I withdraw the amendment to strike out the word "newspapers," and move to insert, in line 3, page 45, before the word "newspapers," the word "professional."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 45, line 3, before the word "newspapers" insert the word "professional."

Mr. HEMENWAY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I want to ask the gentleman, with the word "professional" before the word "newspapers," what newspapers they can buy?

Mr. HAY. Any newspapers of that character.

Mr. HEMENWAY. What is a professional newspaper as applied to this Department of Commerce and Labor?

Mr. HAY. You might call the Scientific American a professional newspaper.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Well, as applied to the labor item?

Mr. HAY. Labor organizations have a great many publications.

Mr. HEMENWAY. As applied to the Bureau of Corporations, what would be professional?

Mr. HAY. I do not know that corporations have any professional newspapers. They seem to have control of a great many newspapers. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEMENWAY. If your amendment is adopted, what newspapers could the Bureau of Corporations buy?

Mr. HAY. What would they want of the newspapers? What statistics could they get from them generally about corporations?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I want to be recognized a minute in opposition to this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The House can see how—I was going to say how ridiculous this amendment would be. Here is a Department of Commerce and Labor, which has its different bureaus—the Bureau of Statistics, the Bureau of Labor, the Bureau of Navigation, the Bureau of Corporations, and all these great bureaus that must have daily newspapers. It is absolutely necessary for them to have the current news. Under the amendment which the gentleman has offered they could not buy them. I think the amendment offered by the gentleman ought to be defeated.

Mr. LIND. Mr. Chairman, I feel very much as does the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. It seems to me that we are quibbling a good deal about matters of not much consequence. We are dealing here with a Department the head of which has had the candor to ask the Appropriations Committee for just what he wanted. He is the only one, as I understand it from the members of the committee, who asked for coachmen specifically, and the head of a Department who goes before the House with so much candor ought certainly to be trusted in the matter of buying newspapers, and who knows but that he may want the newspapers to advertise for the trusts? [Laughter.]

The enforcement of the trust legislation is committed to his Department. I think he ought to be afforded every facility, every opportunity to execute the law as he says he will. He appeared the other evening at the banquet given to the boards of trade in this city, I think, as the spokesman of the President, to present the President's greetings, and in discussing this question of the execution of trust legislation committed to him he said that he wanted the gentlemen before him to understand that these laws would be sanely and conservatively executed.

Now, a man who shows so much discretion, so much care and candor in public affairs, ought to be trusted with a few dollars to expend for newspapers.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 45, line 15, insert "for rent and necessary expenses of the United States shipping commissioners' offices, $6,000."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. To that, Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, the point of order in this case, which I suppose the gentleman from Alabama intends to reserve, is that the appropriation is not in accordance with existing law. It is precisely because this appropriation is in accordance with existing law that I offer the amendment. The law specifically requires that the rent and necessary office expenses of United States shipping commissioners shall be paid out of the Treasury. That requirement has been confirmed by the Supreme Court in an opinion handed down by Justice Shiras in the case of The United States against James C. Reed. It has subsequently been confirmed by special statutory requirement to the effect that these expenses should be paid by the United States Government.

And yet year after year the Commissioner of Navigation has sent in these expenses in his estimates, and year after year the Committee on Appropriations has simply refused to appropriate the money. Now, I am perfectly aware that it is by no means unusual for the Committee on Appropriations to override the law and refuse to appropriate for expenses provided for in existing law; but in this case there is no economy whatever in such a course, because year after year these shipping commissioners go to the Court of Claims and get judgment in their favor for the necessary and legal expenses of their offices. Not one cent is gained by the Government, and a great deal is lost in defending these cases in the Court of Claims, while the shipping commissioners are put to unnecessary expense to get their money. Now, if it was a question of salary it would be one thing. The officer who has less money appropriated for his salary than the law entitles him to has no remedy, but when it is a case of expenses incurred for the Government he can go before the Court of Claims and get his judgment.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of this committee to page 59 of the bill that we are considering. Under the heading "Judgments, Court of Claims," a certain sum is appropriated to pay for judgments in the Court of Claims, as specified in two documents, one of which I hold in my hand, Document No. 275. Three of the claims that are being paid in this very bill under that paragraph are the claims of Robert F. Morse, shipping commissioner at Bath, Me., Joseph M. Dickey, now railroad commissioner of the State of New York and formerly shipping commissioner of the port of New York, and the estate of Ellwood Becker, deceased, the three claims amounting in all to about $7,000. They were adjudged on December 14 last, and we are paying for them in this very bill. Every shipping commissioner whose expenses we cut off will go before the Court of Claims under the decision in the case of The United States v. Reed, and he is going to get this very amount which I ask you to put into the bill.

We shall have to pay it in the long run, and in addition we must go to all the expense of defending those suits. We shall take right out of the pockets of our shipping commissioners their necessary expenses for the litigation in our Court of Claims.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, one of the reasons why I shall insist upon the point of order is that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] did not appear before this committee to make any attempt to procure this appropriation or give an explanation why it should be made. My point of order against the appropriation coming now is that this is an urgent deficiency bill, and the item he contends for would not properly be an item on this bill, even if he had appeared before this committee and attempted to have it put on. This is not an urgency item, and it would naturally go on the sundry civil bill and not on this bill if the appropriation committee appropriated it.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, my item covers a deficiency already accrued. As a matter of fact, I went to the Committee on Appropriations——

Mr. HEMENWAY. Will the gentleman yield for a minute? I will ask the Chair if the point of order has been passed upon?

The CHAIRMAN. It has not. The gentleman from Alabama reserved the point of order, but the Chair understands now that he makes the point that this is not a deficiency appropriation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And especially an urgent deficiency appropriation.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I submit that it is a deficiency appropriation. Those expenses have all been incurred and have not been taken care of by law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair calls the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts to the fact that his amendment does not state for what nor the time these expenses were incurred and for which this $6,000 is to be appropriated. The amendment says simply for expenses of United States shipping commissioners' offices, $6,000.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, if necessary I will insert the words "existing deficiencies;" but I submit that the amendment when read in connection with the whole bill renders no such wording necessary. I will, however, make that addition to my amendment and request that the Clerk add it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Massachusetts to ask that this amendment be inserted in line 15, page 45, as indicated on the amendment?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Under "Contingent expenses," at the end of line 14.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has indicated it was at the end of line 15.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Well, at the beginning of line 15.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 45, line 14, insert, "for rent and necessary expenses of United States shipping commissioners' offices, $6,000, for existing deficiencies."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, as that amendment now reads it is not germane to the paragraph where it is inserted, and I also make that point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would call the attention of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to the fact that this is not offered as a new paragraph, but that it is a continuation of the paragraph just read, after the word "dollars" in line 14.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, it is not germane, Mr. Chairman, to that portion of the bill that we are reading. That paragraph and that section of the bill relate to the contingent expenses in the office of the Secretary of Labor, if I have the right place in the bill. It does not relate to either rent or to the payment of salaries of officials.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I was not aware that I had offered it as an amendment to any particular paragraph of the bill. I offered it as an independent provision.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman to offer it as an addition to the paragraph ending on line 14, page 45. The gentleman now offers it as an additional paragraph to come in after line 14. The Chair is of the opinion that the amendment as modified by the gentleman is in order. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, this amendment ought not to be adopted for the reason that it has not been considered by any committee of the House. There is nothing in the amendment to inform the House as to whom this money is to be paid to, or what for, or why. In addition to that, here are judgments, as the gentleman states, of the Court of Claims, arising out of this same transaction. We do not know whether the judgments included in this item are the same judgments that we appropriate for here in the bill or not. No item of this kind ought to go upon an appropriation bill without first being considered by some committee of this House. This item has not been considered. It has not been referred in the regular way for consideration by the Committee on Appropriations. There was no estimate for it considered by the committee in making up this bill.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Do I understand the chairman of the committee to say that this was not included in the estimate of the United States shipping commissioners?

Mr. HEMENWAY. For the next fiscal year there are some estimates; but nothing at all on this bill.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I submit that in the last estimate this matter which this amendment of mine covers was specifically estimated, and I think that the former chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, now sitting on my right [Mr. CANNON], will bear me out in that statement.

Mr. HEMENWAY. That may be true, but that was at the last Congress. At this session there was no estimate on this subject submitted to the committee having in charge the urgent deficiency bill.

I repeat that the amendment offered by the gentleman has not been considered by any committee. There is nothing in the amendment indicating what it is for, except that it is to cover certain indefinite deficiencies not set out in the amendment and which Congress does not know anything about, and does not know whether or not they are included in items of appropriation in this bill for judgments of the Court of Claims. Certainly it would not be wise for Congress to adopt any proposition of this kind without knowing something about it. I sincerely hope that the amendment will be rejected and that the item will go to the proper committee to be regularly considered and reported upon before being adopted.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Do I understand the gentleman to suppose that the proceedings in our Court of Claims are so rapid that any of the shipping commissioners' expenses of last year can possibly be included in the judgments of the court in the cases of Morse and Dickey and Baker?

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts, it was rejected.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I desire to offer an amendment to insert, after the word "homes," in line 21, page 45, the following words: "and designated headquarters."

Mr. HEMENWAY. I make the point of order that this is a change of law.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Will the gentleman reserve that point for a moment?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I reserve it if the gentleman wishes to be heard.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The point to which I desire to call the attention of the committee is that without these words of limitation this provision will clearly grant to these inspectors $4 additional pay for every day in the year. I do not think that such is the intention of the Committee on Appropriations nor of the Committee of the Whole.

These men will always be away from their homes as soon as appointed; but they will be at headquarters most of the time, and as this is a per diem in lieu of an expense incurred, I think that a limitation ought to be fixed in the law.

I confess that I am not familiar just now with what the law is; but I believe it is the clear intention of the law that the $4 a day in lieu of subsistence is not additional salary, unless the person is away from both his home and his headquarters in the discharge of his duties.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I am not quite sure, Mr. Chairman, discussing the merits of this proposition, whether or not this would be a good provision; but certainly it ought to be considered very carefully before being placed on this bill; and as this is only a deficiency bill, and this item will come up on the regular appropriation bill, I shall insist on my point of order until I can investigate more fully as to what the effect of this change would be. It is certainly a change of existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to ask the gentleman whether there is any law at present specifying these salaries?

Mr. HEMENWAY. No law except such as is enacted in the appropriation bill. The current appropriation law has the language which appears in the deficiency bill. I know of no law other than the law fixed by the current appropriation law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that this amendment is in order. It is merely descriptive of the purpose for which the money is to be appropriated. It does not create any new duties or any new offices. It merely amplifies what is already required under this provision. The Chair overrules the point of order. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. OVERSTREET) there were—ayes 47, noes 33.

Mr. HEMENWAY asked for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chairman appointed Mr. HEMENWAY and Mr. OVERSTREET.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 78, noes 41.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hereafter the clerk of the supreme court of the District of Columbia shall account for official emoluments in the same manner as clerks of the United States circuit and district courts.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, at the request of my colleague [Mr. CRUMPACKER], who is unavoidably detained, and for him, I make the point of order against lines 9, 10, 11, and 12 of page 50 as being contrary to existing law. I am ready to cite to the Chair the provisions of the District code passed in 1901, and the provisions of the law of 1875 governing the conduct of the clerks with reference to their emoluments.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make the point that this changes existing law?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. That it changes existing law, and I have for the inspection of the Chair, or will read to the Chair, the code provisions which were passed in 1901 which govern the conduct of clerks with reference to their emoluments. The purpose of these lines in this bill is to have them governed by the general law of 1875. I will send a marked copy to the Chair. The purpose of this act is to make the provision of the general law applicable to the clerks, instead of the special law that was passed in the District Code of 1901.

The CHAIRMAN. It seems to the Chair that on the face of the paragraph it is legislation involving an accounting for official emoluments different from what the law now contemplates, and from the statute which the gentleman has sent to the desk it is evident that it is a change of existing law. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bill and joint resolution of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

S. 3317. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to grant right of way for pipe lines through Indian lands; and

S. R. 36. Joint resolution accepting a reproduction of the bust of Washington from certain citizens of the Republic of France, and tendering the thanks of Congress to the donors therefor.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to concurrent resolution No. 13.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to Senate concurrent resolution No. 21, had asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. PLATT of New York, Mr. MCCOMAS, and Mr. GORMAN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay amount found due on account of canceling machines, fiscal year 1902, as certified in House Document No. 366, of this session, $225.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, reserving the point of order, I should like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill to explain that item just read.

Mr. HEMENWAY. For canceling machines?

Mr. OVERSTREET. To pay some one for canceling machines, lines 15 to 18, inclusive. What I desire to know is whether that is a clear deficiency or whether the item has been passed upon by any Auditor.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I suggest to the gentleman that the item is an amount found due by the Auditor for the Post-Office Department, an audited account, and so certified.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Is it a certification, or simply a report from the Auditor?

Mr. HEMENWAY. It is a certification of an amount found due by the accounting officers of the Post-Office Department. If the gentleman thinks it ought not to be paid, a motion to strike it out is in order.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I do not want it stricken out if it is a proper item; but I should like to inquire of the gentleman whether or not the hearings before his committee disclosed the fact that this property was actually purchased at a proper price and is now in use?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I refer the gentleman to Document No. 236, and can only say that the Auditor certifies that the amount is due. As to whether the item was purchased at a proper price or not I do not know. We simply have that certificate of the Auditor of an audited account sent down for appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Railway Mail Service: That the number of clerks appropriated for in the Railway Mail Service for the current fiscal year is modified so as to allow 1,185 clerks of class 5, at $1,400 each; 1,671 clerks of class 4, at $1,200 each; 857 clerks of class 4, at $1,100 each; and 3,928 clerks of class 3, at $1,000 each: Provided, That this change shall be made without increasing the aggregate sum of money appropriated for clerks of the several classes of the Railway Mail Service in the post-office appropriation act of March 3, 1903.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 52, line 21, strike out all after the word "allow" down to and including the word "each," in line 3, page 53, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Two thousand six hundred and fifty-six clerks of class 2, at not exceeding $900 a year each, and 780 clerks of class 1, at not exceeding $800 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pay of laborers at division headquarters, rural free-delivery service, $206.44.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill to give some explanation in reference to the pay of laborers at these division headquarters.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Why, it was by some oversight in the classification of the employees of the Department. I will give Mr. Bristow's explanation. You will find this on page 163 of these hearings:

In the last post-office bill there was an appropriation for six clerks, at $700. Formerly they had been laborers, at $700. I suppose in the provision that it was just intended to make them clerks instead of laborers, but the Comptroller has decided differently, and the Civil Service Commission would not classify them. So they were dropped out and new clerks had to be put in their places. These clerks had worked until this much money was due them before we knew that.

In other words, this appropriation bill provides for the pay of these laborers who were used as clerks. The laborers went ahead and did the work, and it was ascertained that they were not allowed the salary until the bill was passed by Congress or is reported by the Post-Office Committee. So we pay these clerks for the time they did the work. This appropriation is necessary.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay amounts found due by the accounting officers of the Treasury and certified in House Document No. 366 of this session on account of the rural free-delivery service for fiscal years, as follows:

For the fiscal year 1902, $346.75.

For the fiscal year 1903, $21,026.37.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Reserving the point of order, I would like to inquire of the gentleman in charge of the bill if these items have been certified by the Auditor?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I call the gentleman's attention to the reading of the bill.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I know the bill says they have been certified.

Mr. HEMENWAY. You will find that they have been audited by the accounting officers of the Treasury and certified in House Document 366 of this session, on account of free rural-delivery service for the fiscal year. I refer the gentleman to the document for the information.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The gentleman has the document in his hand. What I want to know is whether or not Document 366 says that they have been certified by the proper accounting officers who have passed on the facts and know the facts, or whether it is simply the report of an officer that they need the money? If it is a certification then I have no objection.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The bill so states.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The bill so states, but what does the report say?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Well, I suggest to the gentleman that it would not so state in the bill unless it was found that it was true as was stated, and if the gentleman still makes further inquiry I refer him to the document to which I have heretofore called attention. It is Document 366. Mr. Chairman——

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

For mileage of Members of the House of Representatives and Delegates from Territories for the second session of the Fifty-eighth Congress, $145,000.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Before that is read——

Mr. MADDOX. I make the point of order on that.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I tried to stop the Clerk in the reading of the paragraph before we got to it.

Mr. MADDOX. It is understood that I reserve the point of order.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I tried to stop the reading, but did not succeed in doing it. I would like to have the attention of the House. Before the words "House of Representatives," on page 58, before line 1, I ask unanimous consent that the following be inserted, simply to correct the bill before we come to this item.

By an oversight in preparing the bill, or printing the bill, the mileage for the Senate was left out. Now, that ought to go into the bill, so that the point of order can be made against the whole item—the two items taken together—and any discussion that may occur may be made on the whole item under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the amendment which he sends to the Clerk's desk may be inserted before line 1.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 58, before line 1, insert the following:

"SENATE.

"For mileage of Senators for the second session of the Fifty-eighth Congress, $45,000."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I move to strike out the entire paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia made the point of order against this paragraph.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I had risen for the same purpose. Does the Chair recognize the gentleman from Georgia?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair had recognized the gentleman from Georgia upon the conclusion of the reading of the paragraph to make the point of order against the paragraph.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Chairman, I am aware of the fact that this point of order was raised to a similar section in an appropriation bill in the Fifty-third Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Georgia answer the Chair a question for information? The Chair understands the gentleman's point of order includes the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana, and also the paragraph that has just been read.

Mr. MADDOX. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The paragraph as amended with the provision for mileage for the Senate.

Mr. MADDOX. I say, Mr. Chairman, I am aware of the fact that a decision was made by the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole in the Fifty-third Congress holding that this same provision was in order at that time. I, Mr. Chairman, am not satisfied with that decision—at least, with the reasons given when the decision was rendered.

It may be that it is not subject to the point of order, but certainly the reasoning given there, or, in other words, the begging or dodging the question, as it seems to me, does not carry conviction to my mind or to anybody else, I think, who has given due consideration to this ruling, that it is at all conclusive and that this could stand as a precedent. I would like for some chairman to give a better reasoning for it. Now, the reason given in that opinion was simply this: Mr. Hayes, I believe, of Iowa, at that time argued against this point of order that was made by Mr. Lynch. The Chair, ruling upon that point, said that inasmuch as we had diverted the sum originally appropriated for the regular session of Congress to be used, or, in other words, had made it available in the extra session, therefore that there being no question about the present session being a regular session, just as in this present instance a regular session, that we were entitled to the mileage of that regular session.

Thereupon the Chairman decided that point—the point of order not well taken. He did not take into consideration when he decided the point as to whether the amount or the sum that had been appropriated for the regular session had been diverted to the extra session for which we were not entitled. They proposed to bolster up the decision by getting a letter from the Auditor at that time. The Auditor also dodges the question and says this thing being a regular session that they are entitled to the mileage. We all know that. The statute is perfectly plain upon that subject, that each regular session we are entitled to the mileage. The question is, though, are we, when we divert the regular mileage for the payment of a special or extraordinary session, to be allowed to come in here now and appropriate for a regular session when we have taken the mileage from the regular session, put it in our pockets, and have spent it.

Now, that is the question I want to hear the Chair rule on. I apprehend that the Chair probably will have some trouble upon this point—that is, the question as to whether the extraordinary session merged into the regular session and made one continuous session, or, in other words, whether there was any length of time between the extraordinary session and the regular session by which we can claim that there have been two sessions of Congress. Now, so much for that point of order. Now the question is, if I may be permitted to go forward on this line, Is it expedient, gentlemen, to pass this resolution giving to ourselves this extra money?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield to me for a moment, I want to ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment to the item under consideration.

Mr. MADDOX. All right.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And let it be pending to the proposition which the gentleman is now discussing.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to have pending, subject to the point of order——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That any Member of the Congress so desiring may cover any money due to him as a part of this appropriation into the Treasury, and it shall be received by the Secretary of the Treasury as a miscellaneous item.

[Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio? The Chair hears none.

This question does not involve the merits of the proposition, and the Chair hopes that gentlemen will confine themselves to a discussion of the point of order.

Mr. MADDOX. I would like to be heard on the merits, too.

The CHAIRMAN. There will be an opportunity for that, possibly, if the paragraph is retained in the bill.

Mr. MADDOX. I have often, not only in this House, but in other legislative bodies, heard that cheap amendment offered, such as has been offered by the gentleman from Ohio, before. I know I need not draw this money without the amendment, so far as that is concerned. I can exercise that right without any advice from the gentleman from Ohio or even of this House. That is my privilege to do, and it is my privilege to take it if I wish after this House has determined that it is legal. I am not proposing to set myself up here as better than any other Member of this House or that my judgment is better than anybody else's.

I want to say to the Chair that the Fifty-third Congress was not the first time that this question has been presented to the Congress of the United States. On more than two occasions that I know of—in which the records will bear me out—this proposition was voted down. As I say, the point is whether this is a regular session or an extraordinary session, or whether the extra session is merged into the regular session.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Georgia that if this is a regular session—the second session of the Fifty-eighth Congress—then there is authority of law for the appropriation carried by this paragraph?

Mr. MADDOX. The point I make to the Chair is simply this, that the appropriation made for the regular session was diverted to the special session, and the question now is as to whether this clause in the bill making a new appropriation for mileage for the regular session when we have already received that sum which was appropriated for the regular session. In other words, can we draw mileage for an extra session which was appropriated for the regular session and then vote ourselves another mileage for the regular session?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD said: Mr. Chairman, if in order, I would like to make a few suggestions in support of the point of order. I wish to state at the outset, Mr. Chairman, that I have not a word to say about the propriety or the impropriety of the pending proposition. Whether, if it reaches that stage, Members vote to pass the bill as it stands or vote to strike out the proposition is a question for every single individual Member, and I do not think he is to be criticised or reflected upon, either directly or indirectly, by any Member of the House. It is purely a personal proposition. I shall not spend a moment on the merits, or morality, or equity of the appropriation. In my judgment—of course I may be wrong—the appropriation is not authorized by existing law.

The appropriation provides for mileage for the second session of the Fifty-eighth Congress, and, in my opinion, the only question raised by the point of order, or that can properly be raised or debated in committee is whether or not this is a second session of the Fifty-eighth Congress, or whether we are now in the first session of the Fifty-eighth Congress.

The history of the situation is simply this: During the last term of Congress an appropriation was made for mileage for the Congress that would meet on the first Monday of December, 1903. Congress met on the 9th day of November, 1903, under a call of the President for what may be termed and sometimes is termed a "special session," or an "extraordinary session"—and I may say right here that the Constitution does not recognize any distinction between sessions; it does not refer to a regular session or a special session or an extraordinary session.

What is termed popularly a "regular" session, to be sure, begins on the first Monday of December of each year, because, unless otherwise provided, that is when Congress assembles. Congress is assembled when an extraordinary occasion exists under the proclamation of the President, and Congress did then assemble as the Fifty-eighth Congress. It is not mentioned in the Constitution as an "extraordinary" or "special" or "extra" session. It simply says "he may, on extraordinary occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them."

When this Congress met on the 9th day of November, or shortly after, by joint resolution, very properly it diverted the appropriation for mileage made for the Congress that was to meet on the first Monday of December, 1903, to the payment of the mileage of the Congress that met on the 9th day of November, 1903. But it left no appropriation for mileage for this Congress, assuming now that there is a distinction between the two sessions.

The precedent referred to in the Fifty-third Congress is not in the slightest degree in point. It hasn't anything to do with the case pending here, because there was in that case two separate and independent sessions. The law now provides that an appropriation for mileage can be made for each regular session, and the only question is whether the session we are now engaged in is a regular session. It does not make any difference how many days of the session we have had or how short the interregnum was, if there was an interregnum, we are entitled to mileage for the regular session, in my judgment, nor if that is the fact do I see any legal reason why a man should be criticised for voting for it.

There is no question but that Congress has the power to appropriate or divert the mileage appropriated for a session beginning on the first Monday of December to one beginning on the 9th day of November.

Then the question recurs, there being no appropriation for mileage in addition thereto, will it now appropriate for mileage for the session that is alleged to have begun on the first Monday of December?

That raises the specific question as to whether or not we are now in a continuous session or whether there are clearly two sessions. If two sessions, this appropriation is correct; it is authorized by existing law and it ought to be made, and every man can properly receive it. Now, if there is a continuous session, then there is only one session, then there is no law that authorizes the appropriation of two mileages for any one session. What is mileage for a session? Mileage, I take it, is the sum that enables a Member of Congress to attend at the beginning and return to his home at the end of a session of Congress. Everybody concedes, no matter what the other facts may be, that in this case this Congress, or, at least, Congress, did meet on the 9th day of November, 1903, and continued its session, in any event, until 12 o'clock noon on the 7th day of December, 1903, so that, of course, as a matter of fact, the mileage extended until that time.

We were paid for coming here on the 9th day of November, and we were paid for returning on the 7th day of December at 12 o'clock, and if there is an interregnum we would equally be entitled to pay under existing law for returning at the same 12 o'clock to attend the regular session. In my judgment the only question is, Is there one continuous session or, under the circumstances, are there two? In other words, is there an interregnum? In my opinion, and I may be wrong about it, there was no interregnum. Under what circumstances does Congress meet? What calls it together? Well, the provisions of the Constitution: and what are they? In the first place, this provision, which provides:

> The Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall be on the first Monday in December, unless they shall by law appoint a different date.

In this case Congress has not by law appointed any different date, so that, so far as the discussion at this stage is concerned, that does not disturb us; but there is another way by which Congress can constitutionally meet. That is provided for in section 3 of Article II, prescribing the duties of the President:

> He may, on extraordinary occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them, and in case of disagreement between them, with respect to the time of adjournment, he may adjourn them to such time as he shall think proper.

That is not a final adjournment, but simply an adjournment "to such time as he shall think proper." On extraordinary occasions he can call Congress in session. It is not an extraordinary session by the language of the Constitution, it is not an extra session by the language of the Constitution, but the extraordinary occasion intervening, then the President can exercise the power to call, for instance, the Fifty-eighth Congress into session. Congress having been constitutionally called to meet on the 9th day of November, 1903, and being in session, its session can not be terminated and ended except in one of two ways. What are they? First, by adjournment of the body itself; second, by operation of law.

The only question here is, then, whether after the 9th day of November, 1903, Congress had adjourned, in the first instance, on its own motion. Everybody concedes that it had not. There has not been any attempt to adjourn without day finally from that time until to-day. The only other question left is, Was Congress terminated by operation of law? because that is the only other way by which it can be terminated, and that brings us to this proposition: Does the fact that the Constitution requires Congress, if it is not in session, to meet on the first Monday in December of itself terminate a Congress that is then in session? In my judgment, it does not. What is the purpose, object, and intent of that provision of the Constitution, and its only purpose, object, and intent? Simply to call Congress together in order that it may be in session as a Congress. It is simply for the purpose of calling it together.

The Constitution designates a specific day in order that Congress may "assemble at least once in every year." The assembling "at least once in every year" is the real essential and sole purpose of the specific constitutional day of meeting.

Now, Congress was already together and in session when that time intervened. It met on the 9th day of November, 1903, and it continued in session, and there was no occasion for it to meet in order to begin session, because it was here in session. The only purpose that can be accomplished by this provision of the Constitution as to the time of meeting is to cause Congress to meet and begin a session. That is its only purpose and object. In this instance, on the 7th day of December, 1903, this provision had nothing upon which to operate, as the Fifty-eighth Congress had already met and was then in session. The object of this provision had already been accomplished. The Fifty-eighth Congress had already assembled "at least once" in the year 1903, and the only essential mandate of the Constitution had been obeyed. It is a familiar legal principle that when the reason for a law fails, the law fails and the rule ceases to operate. If the Fifty-eighth Congress had not been in session when the hour of 12 o'clock noon, December 7, 1903, arrived, it would have been its duty to meet and begin its session; but it had no occasion to meet for that purpose, either constructively or actually, because it had already met and was in session.
